Diary of the Week.

PARLIAMENT was opened by the Sovereign on Monday, and the Session inaugurated with a Speech which opened up a wide vista of bewilderment for the Liberal Party. Save for the reference to the opening of the South African Parliament by the Prince of Wales, a mention of Lord Morley's scheme of Indian reforms, the promise of a substantial increase in the cost of the Navy, and a hint of financial confusion, the speech was confined to the topic of the Lords, and this was so far satisfactory.

* * *

BUT its language was neither clear nor even grammatical. The situation was described in two paragraphs. The first declared that "serious difficulties" existed between the two parties of the legislature. The second announced that proposals would be made, with all convenient speed, to secure the undivided authority of the Commons over finance, and its predominance in legislation. This pointed to an anti-veto Bill, but the paragraph proceeded to sketch a scheme for the reform of the Lords. Its phrasing ran as follows:—

"These measures, in the opinion of my advisers, should provide that this House should be so constituted and empowered as to exercise impartially, in regard to proposed legislation, the functions of initiation, revision, and, subject to proper safeguards, of delay."

The words "this House" would in the natural sense refer to the Commons, but they were spoken of the Lords, and obviously related to that assembly. A more serious confusion has arisen from the words "constituted and empowered," which suggest that the constitution of the House of Lords, as well as its relation to the Commons, has been under review by the Cabinet.

* * *

THIS would seem to be the case, and it is probable that the view of at least a section of the Cabinet, led by Sir Edward Grey, was conveyed by Colonel Seely, who is seeking election at Ilkeston in Sir Walter Foster's place, and with greater crudeness by Mr. Pease, on whose behalf Sir William Holland has resigned. Mr.

Pease, indeed, omitted all reference to the Veto, and had the assurance to say that the Government would proceed with "the great Bill of this Session, the reconstitution of the House of Lords." Colonel Seely proposed, in brief, to set up a small Second Chamber or Senate. It was to be elected by the same constituencies as the House of Commons, and any elector would be eligible for it, the hereditary element being completely abolished. In cases of difficulty with the House of Commons, the two Chambers would sit and vote together, the calculation being that, by this machinery, and by the democratic character of the body, all but very small majorities of the Commons would eventually get their way.

* * *

WE argue the question of a re-constituted Chamber elsewhere, but we note that the moment it was hinted at a strong force of opposition from the Radicals was developed. Sir Charles Dilke presided over a meeting of members who asked for concentration on the Veto, and saw the Prime Minister, while Sir Henry Dalziel gave notice of the following amendment to the Government's motion for taking the whole time of the House:—

"That inasmuch as no mandate has been received from the electorate for any reform or reconstruction of the House of Lords, this House declines to grant any facilities for discussion of any resolutions having that object in view."

* * *

ON Thursday there was a meeting of Liberal members representing Northern constituencies—the backbone of the Parliamentary Party—and also of the Liberal members for Scotland. It is understood that both these gatherings revealed an overwhelming majority in favor of the policy which aims at the destruction of the Veto and against a scheme of reconstruction.
We believe, indeed, that only two members—one at each gathering—expressed any convinced belief in the latter policy. Indeed, it is already clear that if the Government pursues it, it is doomed. One mistake has been made; another would be fatal. The vital purpose of the Ministry must be to preserve the unity of the party, and the simultaneous and harmonious action of its allies.

* * *

WE are sure that Mr. Asquith is alive to this necessity, and equally sure that it cannot be attained by even the best devised and most democratic form of Constitution-mongering. On this point his statement to the Trade Congress Deputation seems to us clear and satisfactory. "They could not," he said, "get electoral reform as long as they had an Assembly which was determined not to give it to them, and that Assembly had the power of defeating the legislation of their representatives. As he had said, the condition precedent to the attainment of any of these reforms was the settlement of that great question"—that is the Veto. Meanwhile, Lord Rosebery proposes that the Lords should constitute themselves immediately into a Committee for reforming themselves, and plan after plan of change pours from the Tory Press. A clear warning to Liberals not to do likewise.

A PROFOUND sensation has been caused by the Prime Minister's speech in supporting the Address. Mr. Asquith, while declaring that this Parliament was devoted to the restoring of the supremacy of the Commons over finance, and to destroying the legislative Veto of the Lords, gave a rendering of his Albert Hall speech which seemed to his audience to take from the Parliament all hope of effecting those purposes. He explained that his reference was to statutory safeguards, not to the exercise of the Royal prerogative:—

"I tell the House quite frankly," said Mr. Asquith, "that I have received no such guarantees, and that I have asked for no such guarantees. In my judgment it is the duty of statesmen and of responsible politicians in this country as long as possible and as far as possible to keep the name of the Sovereign and the prerogatives of the Crown outside the domain of party politics. If the occasion should arise I should not hesitate to tender such advice to the Crown as in the circumstances the exigencies of the situation appear to warrant in the public interests. But to ask in advance for a blank authority for an indefinite exercise of the Royal prerogative in regard to a measure which has never been submitted to or approved by the House of Commons is a thing which, in my judgment, no constitutional statesman can properly make, and it is a concession which the Sovereign cannot be expected to grant."

PROBABLY Mr. Asquith said less than he might have said, for we believe that the question of guarantees has been mentioned to the King, at least since the election. But the bare limitation of the Albert Hall speech struck a chill through the Ministerial ranks, and the rest of Mr. Asquith's speech, which announced that the Government would first proceed by resolutions introduced in the Commons, but not in the Lords, that the Budget was to be carried at a later period, and that there would be immediate steps for settling the financial confusion, was heard almost in silence. Incidentally Mr. Asquith mentioned that there was a deficiency of twenty-five millions in the returns of income tax.

* * *

THE speech was at once criticised by Mr. Redmond, who, proclaiming his independence of British parties, declined to accept Mr. Asquith's reading of his Albert Hall pledge, or his outline of Ministerial policy. He thought the natural meaning of the earlier speech was that the Prime Minister would not assume or hold office unless he saw his way to the passing of a Bill dealing with the veto, of course with the help of the Royal prerogative. On that reading of the pledge, said Mr. Redmond, the election was fought, and no hint was given to a contrary effect. In particular, the Irish Party had been organised on the understanding that the Government were not prepared to accept responsibility for carrying on until this question was settled. He admitted, however, that there was force in Mr. Asquith's plea that, as things stood, the Sovereign could not promise to create peers in favor of a Bill he had not seen. If that was so, the Government's plan should be produced without a moment's delay, or simultaneous resolutions, as THE NATION suggested last week, might be introduced in the Commons and in the Lords. When these resolutions had been passed in one House and thrown out in the other, the King would be seized of the situation, and the Government could act.

THIS speech, significantly cheered by Liberal and Radical members, threw the whole situation in doubt.

Mr. Redmond had practically told the Government that it must either be "Veto first" or an appeal for guarantees, and that, if neither course were taken, he would not support the Budget. The Irish pressure was re-enforced on the following day by Mr. Wm. O'Brien. This revenant from the old Home Rule battles appeared as an almost avowed Conservative force. He declared that he had come to Westminster to destroy the Budget, which would make Home Rule a curse instead of a blessing, and standing as a prophet of a new peasant proprietary, Conservative and Protectionist, offered an eirenicon to the Tory Unionists. Mr. O'Brien's speech may give the Tories a fresh ally, but it may fatally divide the Irish urban vote in Great Britain, which is democratic, from that of the new landowners under the Wyndham Act. In the later speeches of the debate, Mr. Redmond's attitude, as distinguished from Mr. O'Brien's, was supported by Radicals like Mr. Belloc, who spoke with striking brilliancy of phrasing, and by Liberal moderates like Sir Albert Spicer.

THE Protectionist case was revived on Wednesday by Mr. Austen Chamberlain in an official Opposition amendment rehearsing the usual formulæ of Tariff Reform, and endeavoring to catch the Irish vote. It was rejected on Thursday night by 285 votes to 254—a majority of 31. The two sections of the Irish Nationalists abstained, but the majority would have reached forty but for five vacant Liberal seats and the accidental absence of four Labor members. Mr. Chamberlain's speech was a rehearsal of ancient and more extreme Protectionist legends, unaccompanied by any kind of supporting evidence. On the other side were Mr. Buxton's statements as to the official prices of German bread under the import duties, Mr. Runciman's powerful exposition of the policy of open ports, Mr. Mond's riddling of the coarser Protectionist arguments, and Mr. Lloyd George's illustrations, from official German reports, of the way in which the poorer German workmen are driven by high prices on to food repellent to our people.

* * *

BUT the gem of the debate was Mr. Balfour's revelations of the truth of Mr. Kettle's jibe that the object of the Protectionists' amendment was to nail not their flag, but their leader, to the mast. As usual, Mr. Balfour alternately submitted to his bonds and tried to break through them. He practically unsaid all the wilder electioneering assertions of the Tariff Reformers—his own included. Thus he admitted (a) that it was not his view that all protective duties would be paid by the foreigner; (b) that it was "only a speculation" that Colonial preferences would result in reducing the price of bread; (c) that he could not "promise" that there would be no increase in the price of food as the result of food taxes; (d) that he had never held Tariff Reform to be a cure for unemployment. Having thus taken all the fuel out of the Protectionist engine, Mr. Balfour proceeded to pretend to drive it full speed ahead. One or two of the new Tory members showed some zeal and freshness in the Protectionist cause, which their great leader may be trusted to extinguish.

THE wheel of events in Thibet has turned full circle, and its theocratic ruler, the Dalai Lama, who fled to China, a refugee from a British invasion, is now a fugitive in British India from Chinese pursuers. It is not possible as yet to understand the causes of what has happened.

The Dalai Lama, after Lord Curzon's expedition, fled first to Urga, in Mongolia, and then to Peking, where he remained up to last year. Meanwhile the Chinese suzerainty had become a reality, and the Chinese garrison had been largely increased. The troops were apparently non-Buddhist, and are said to have looted monasteries and killed Lamas. What exactly happened in Lhasa we do not know, nor is it clear whether there was only a contest between Chinese and Thibetans, or also a civil strife among the Thibetans themselves. But the Dalai Lama was driven from his capital and pursued to the Indian frontier by a force of 2,000 Chinese troops. He has now appealed to Lord Minto for protection, while two Thibetan envoys who accompanied him are addressing a complaint to the Chinese Government.

It is fairly clear that this is a situation which does not directly concern us, or call for our intervention. By the Anglo-Chinese Convention of 1906, and later by the Anglo-Russian Convention, the suzerainty of China was recognised, we might almost say re-established. The civil power has come to blows with the religious power, as was indeed inevitable, and the theocracy has been worsted. Chinese rule cannot be worse than that of the Lamas, though it would be proper, if the allegations as to the brutality of the Chinese troops are well-founded, that our Minister should address an informal remonstrance to the Chinese Government. It remains to be seen whether the flight of the Buddhist pontiff will mean the migration of the central seat of Buddhism to its original home in India. If that were to happen, it might conceivably mean a partial reformation of an unspeakably corrupt cult, and even, as some Imperialist writers already reckon, its subjection to British influences. But the prestige of the Thibetan priesthood is already low, and its authority very doubtful in countries where Buddhism has continued to be a spiritual religion. A Buddhist Pope in a British Avignon would not be likely to increase his power.

ON Sunday, the Egyptian Prime Minister, Boutros Pasha Ghali, was shot by a young Nationalist chemist, Ibrahim Wardany, and died on Monday from his wounds. A Copt by religion, Boutros Pasha had behind him a long official record as Foreign and Finance Minister. He was a respectable, but not a strong, personality, and had lent himself as President to the proceedings of the Denshawai court-martial. The assassin, who was at once captured, is a Nationalist of some standing, and had studied chemistry at Lausanne. He is said (though this is denied) to have been the Secretary of the Young Egyptian Congress held last year at Geneva, and to have acted as correspondent to "El Lewa," the Nationalist organ. Numerous arrests were made after the murder, but few of them have been maintained. Wardany denies that he had accomplices, and there is no reason to suppose that he acted for his party. The Ministry has been remodelled, with the minimum of change, under Mohammed Said Bey.

THE details of the new Constitution which has been granted to Bosnia-Herzegovina are now known. They are fairly liberal, and may well excite the envy of the Slav races which find themselves under Magyar rather than Austrian rule. The general provisions for the liberty of the subject will be those which obtain in Austria proper. The Diet will have full competence in all domestic questions, the affairs of the common army, tariffs, and the like being naturally beyond its scope. It will consist of seventy-two elected and twenty nominated members, of whom fifteen will be the heads of the three religious communities. The electors are subdivided first according to creed, and then according to property, into landowners, urban, and rural voters. The Orthodox Serbs will have thirty-one seats, the Mohammedans twenty-four, the Catholics sixteen, and the Jews one. An interesting provision is that women who are qualified as landowners or large tax-payers may exercise the franchise through a deputy—the universal practice in feudal times. The apparent Liberalism of these provisions is not, perhaps, so startling as it seems. The Austrian officials doubtless reckon on ruling by the divisions of their subjects.

AN experiment, painfully suggestive of decadence, is about to be tried in Algeria. The French Chamber, by an overwhelming majority, has authorised the employment there of a battalion of black Senegalese infantry, which may afterwards be increased to three. It is hoped that, if the experiment succeeds, the whole of the 19th Army Corps may be transferred to the Eastern Frontier of France, and that in time of war the defence of Algeria might be left wholly to black troops. M. Jaurès and his followers raised an ineffectual protest. The consequences of a dwindling birth-rate in France are evident, and they are being faced without false pride.—The chief event of the week in Paris has been the passing on M. Hervé, the anti-militarist leader, of the savage sentence of four months' imprisonment. In the course of a Press campaign against the corruption and brutality of the police, more especially the "Police des Mœurs," he remarked that a man whose women relatives had been insulted by this branch of the police would do well to imitate Liabeuf, the "Apache" who shot a policeman to avenge a wrongful imprisonment. The incitement is indefensible, but the punishment, deliberately pronounced, will anger large bodies of French opinion.

PHILADELPHIA has witnessed, during the week, one of those peculiarly savage strikes which are the spasmodic answer of labor to the growing power of trusts and corporations. Six thousand tramwaymen struck against a company which owes its privileges to the dubious manœuvres of a political ring. The company made an effort to run its cars with non-union labor, to which the men replied by burning or blowing up some 300 cars. One hundred persons are said to have been injured by explosions or in encounters with the police. A sympathetic general strike of all the organised labor of the city has been threatened. Meanwhile, a decision by a Connecticut court in a trade boycott case has created a situation analogous to that produced by our own Taff Vale judgment. Labor unions may now be sued for damages due to boycotting, which is pronounced "a criminal conspiracy in restraint of trade."

* * *

WE regret to note the death of Mr. Arthur Walter, the fourth and, we are afraid, the last member of the dynasty which founded and controlled the "Times." In 1894 Mr. Walter succeeded his father, the famous member for Berkshire, and the third of the Walters, as manager and chief proprietor; and in 1908 exchanged this position for that of chairman of the "Times" Publishing Company. We suppose that with his death the line of the Walters comes to an end, and that of the Harmsworths begins.

Politics and Affairs.

THE CRISIS AND A WAY OUT.

READERS of THE NATION will have been fully prepared for the grave events which have followed the Prime Minister's reading on Monday of the conditions for his tenure of office which he laid down, with great emphasis, in his Albert Hall speech. Those conditions were endorsed, with equal or greater clearness, by many of his colleagues; and there was, we think, an almost universal interpretation of their significance. Nor was this interpretation merely formal, for the majority was gathered together, and the party wrought to a high pitch of encouragement and enthusiasm, by the pledge which Mr. Asquith's words were thought to contain. What was that pledge? The Prime Minister said that he would not "assume" office and would not "hold" office unless he had secured "safeguards" for the "legislative utility and honor of the party of progress." Mr. Asquith stated on Monday that the guarantees which he had in mind were merely legislative, that he had not sought the Sovereign's aid and had not received it, and that it was unconstitutional to ask the King to exercise his prerogative in favor of a Bill which the House of Commons had never seen or discussed. This is hardly a complete statement of the case. Even if the Liberal and Labor and Irish Parties were wrong, their error had grave results in policy. It led them to hope for at least some decisive result to the election, if it were favorable to Liberalism. Either the party could go forward with some assurance of an issue, or, failing the assistance of the Crown, it could throw the whole responsibility for the constitutional deadlock on the body that had caused it, and, refusing all further share in the King's Counsels, could face the final defeat of the Peers with calm certainty. Indeed, it is clear that, if it had not entertained this view, it could not have approved a Dissolution which merely condemned the succeeding Parliament to a fruitless struggle. It would have preferred to use the constitutional powers latent in the House of Commons for forcing the Budget on the House of Lords. It thought, therefore, that Mr. Asquith had gone to the King with some such proposition as this: "Sir, the House of Lords have rendered party government impossible. There is no further hope of fair play for us. They will not look at our measures even if we return with our present majority, still less if it is reduced. Therefore, I come to you. The Constitution provides for your intervention in the case in which the House of Lords repeatedly sets itself against the will of the House of Commons. Here is my plan for dealing with its absolute veto, which is now seen to be inconsistent with anything like an equal balance between the two parties. If I am returned to power with a sufficient majority, will you give me your support? If you cannot, the Liberal Party will be forced out of the constitutional system, and your Throne must seek support only from statesmen who can deal with the House of Lords, and can form Governments whose measures will be fairly treated by them." The precise terms of Mr. Asquith's speech suggested that on these lines he had hope of an issue.

This, therefore, was the general interpretation placed upon Mr. Asquith's words. The Prime Minister must, we are sure, see that no other was reasonably possible. If, as is now suggested, only legislative guarantees were meant, his followers, realising that fact, would have answered, "But you are condemning us to a fresh ploughing of the sands. Is this General Election, to which you have invited us, to go for nought? Has the King no part to play; or is there no remedy but revolution for the action of the Lords?" If we come to the language of his Albert Hall speech, and to Mr. Lloyd George's still more precise speech at the National Liberal Club, we see at once the difficulty of restricting his pledge to the promise to introduce a Bill into the House of Commons. Supposing the Prime Minister had been defeated at this election, and had assumed office as the result of a following contest. How could he pass a Bill before he formed a Government? And, conversely, if he had come back with a majority, not of 124, but of 400, would he have declared it unconstitutional to ask the King for guarantees? We cannot think so. The Prime Minister, we are sure, intended no deception, and, when he spoke on Monday, meant, we imagine, that the verdict of the electors was too inconclusive to admit of that resort to the Crown which he did not exclude from his general plan of campaign, and did hint as a later development of it. Let us, therefore, try to re-knit the unravelled situation, and see what prospect it contains of a substantial realisation of Mr. Asquith's original lead.

And first, though the spirit of the party has been damped, and its confidence in its leaders shaken, its purpose is not abated, nor has the chance of attaining it been destroyed. The breach with the Irish and the Labor Parties has arisen merely on a question of tactics, and outside the Government there is not a member of the majority who would have any hesitation in pursuing a vigorous policy of attack on the Lords. This may be said with equal confidence of the country. At the least computation the anti-Lords majority exceeded 400,000 votes. Had the issue been fought on the peers alone, both parties agree that the plurality would have been overwhelming. Consciousness of this fact is visible in our opponents' tactics. While we hesitate to attack the Peers, and doubt about our strategy, the Tory army of defence has struck its tents and is already in full retreat. A secret caucus of the Lords is sitting at this moment with the object of devising in raw haste a scheme of reform. The Tory papers of all shades of opinion are tumbling over each other in their zeal to produce some plausible alternative to a House full of elements that cannot stand criticism. One proposes a mixture of nomination, election, and the hereditary principle; another would combine nomination and heredity; while a third abandons heredity altogether. The "Observer," admitting the whole Liberal case, frankly gives up a House that pretends to be a plain-sailing Chamber of revision, and in that dress simply scuttles Liberal measures. Lord Rosebery, quick to seize the mood of the hour, calls on the House of Lords to constitute itself into a Committee of Safety for Itself before the Easter Recess. Everywhere there is movement in this Valley of Dry Bones, on the evening of an election which, according to the Opposition, settles nothing in particular. Compare this feverish stir with the haughty refusal of the Lords two generations ago even to consider the question of life peerages. The situation resembles the competition between the two parties over Reform in the 'sixties, when Disraeli threw over fancy franchises and laid the basis of a democratic suffrage. The moral for Liberalism is as clear to-day as it was then. The party which stands firmest to the principles of representative government will win. That way and no way else lies the true path.

It seems to us, therefore, that it would be a scandalous defeat of the representative principle if through mere differences as to procedure the signal verdict of last month, invoked as it was by the Prime Minister's address, and weightier in character even than in numbers, were ignored. Neither party desires a second election; every group and segment of a group in the Commons deprecates it. So long as the miracle of 1906 was not repeated, such an election might not produce a settlement, while it sowed a plentiful crop of exasperated feelings. And, on the other hand, all the various constituents of the majority—Radicals, Nationalists, Labor men—desire to give this Parliament its voice in the controversy, and only differ among themselves because the Lords seem likely to stifle that voice, as they muffled its predecessor. On his side, the King must welcome a clearance of an issue which threatens, either for himself or for his successor, the loss of the system which keeps his throne propped by two equally powerful forces, saves it from the jar of direct contact with the popular will, and yet allows it to sun itself in the favor of all men. Is there not a means of reconciling all these aims and interests?

There seems to us to be one such plan, and that is through an ad hoc Referendum. The general method of the Referendum has been much canvassed in this country, and has received support both from Radical thinkers and from Conservative politicians. On the whole, it seems to us unsuited to our normal Constitution, for it is calculated to weaken and eventually to destroy the principle of Ministerial responsibility to the Commons, on which our system of Government mainly rests. The loss of the absolute veto of the peers must necessarily be linked with a scheme for shorter Parliaments, which in its turn gives us a fair approach to the Referendum. But a special application of the principle does seem suited to an emergency like the present, arising from a definite, simple issue, almost insoluble by the mixed appeal of a General Election, and yet urgently called for by the existing majority. Mr. Chamberlain, indeed, thought that it might fittingly decide the question of a tariff. Its advantages as an immediate solution of our present difficulties are clear. It gets rid of the immense disturbance of a second election, with its creaking, cumbrous, costly, and highly irritating machinery. It enables an immediate appeal to be made to the Prerogative on more moderate lines than a request for an immediate and large creation of Peers. Also, it sets the House of Lords face to face with the tribunal before which it professes to bow while continually evading the practical results involved in the return of a Liberal Government. Finally, the Referendum is easily put in operation. Probably it might involve a short amendment of the Ballot Act. But in substance a Referendum, for this occasion only, could be set in motion by Letters Patent—that is to say, by using the power under which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's Government shaped the South African Constitution. The same device is in fairly constant use for high ecclesiastical or legal appointments, and it represents a normal and regular resort to the Prerogative, existing as a useful supplement to Parliamentary institutions. The Referendum cannot, indeed, over-ride statute law, but if a small supporting Act were necessary, we cannot imagine the Lords resisting it. Would they "refer" a Budget without the existence of any machinery for a regular examination of a complicated set of taxes, and could they refuse to "refer" a simple subject, carefully defined beforehand, and restricted to so intelligible an issue as the Veto? If they did, such hypocrisy would be its own condemnation, and the way would be cleared for any straight and simple dealing with them.

Let us assume, therefore, that the Government decides to make this Parliament an effective organ for settling the question of the Lords. We have a right to assume that this is its intention, and, indeed, by the confession of the King's Speech, this is the only reason for its existence, as well as the one condition of support from its Labor and Irish allies. If it sees no means of giving prompt and powerful effect to the firm will and passionate desire of its supporters in Parliament and out of it, its duty is to resign. In our opinion such a means exists. It is an unusual method, but it is a direct and fruitful one, for if a Veto Bill or Resolution passes the House of Commons by an adequate majority, and then receives the confirming votes of, say, half-a-million to a million voices, the call for full action by the Crown on a recalcitrant House of Lords would be imperative. Mr. Asquith's speech, as we said, reserves the point of a final appeal to the Crown. Could it be made with greater force than after a successful Referendum? Such a prospect would relieve the majority of the angry sense of futility which Monday's speech aroused. Ministers owe it to their Parliamentary followers to remove this weight. Still more do they owe it to the hundreds of thousands of workers outside. These men's devotion to democracy gloriously withstood the pressure of wealth and social power, and it was mainly sustained on this issue of the Lords. Their only petition to their leaders is for the means of giving effect to a profound conviction, and of lifting from our Constitution a burden that will assuredly sink it. Unless their appeal is responded to, the forces of progress may be destroyed, and cannot but be disintegrated and depressed.

THE ADVANTAGE OF A SINGLE ISSUE.

BEFORE the country can be consulted on the constitutional issue it is very necessary that the form in which that issue is to be presented should be carefully thought out and finally determined. The question has not been suddenly sprung upon us. It is more than three years since the rejection of two Government Bills brought the relation between the Houses into the forefront of politics. The Government, which was continuous and substantially identical with the present Government, carefully considered the alternative possibilities, and, after mature consideration, decided that the point to attack was not the constitution of the House of Lords, but the power of Veto. This line of attack on the Lords had been gathering strength in the Liberal Party for many years. It was advocated by Lord Herschell and John Bright, and it was accepted by the National Liberal Federation, almost with unanimity, at a great meeting in 1904. This unanimity was a great point gained, and it unquestionably weighed with Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's Government. They put forward proposals for the limitation of the veto, and introduced them in a resolution which was carried by a large majority in the House of Commons. Time passed, and the controversy became more acute. The position was repeatedly discussed, and still the limitation of the veto held the field. The Budget was rejected, and the position of the Government was announced at the Albert Hall. It was still the veto which was before the country, only now in a more extended form. The Lords had pushed their pretensions further, and claimed authority in the region of finance. This only made it necessary to extend the counter-policy by providing for the complete abolition of the financial veto together with the restriction of the veto on legislation. Still not a word was heard of reconstitution. It was not till the electoral fight was well under way that we heard of a Minister mentioning the subject of reform, and it is safe to say that the overwhelming majority of Mr. Asquith's supporters told their constituents that the veto of the Lords was the point of controversy, and that any proposal for the reconstitution of the Upper House must await its settlement. It is, therefore, with some bewilderment that the prominence given to the constitution of the Second Chamber in the King's Speech has been received, a bewilderment which, we fear, would give way to quite another state of mind if the actual proposal of the Government should be found to entangle the relatively simple question of the veto with the controversial coil involved in any scheme of reconstruction.

The first duty of the Government, then, is to avoid this pitfall. We are well aware that, in the abstract, a cogent argument may be set up for a renovated Second Chamber. It may be plausibly represented, not without force, as a more far-reaching scheme than the mere limitation of the Veto. Let us assume it to be, for the sake of argument, as democratic and as far-reaching as possible. Let us assume that it would involve the complete elimination of the hereditary principle, the election of a small Second Chamber by a constituency at least as wide as the present, and at the same time some mechanism to secure, by joint representation, the last word on all subjects to the House of Commons. If these conditions be not sufficient, let anyone add to them as he pleases, and conceive that we have the most popular Second Chamber that can be devised. Such a scheme would be far more sweeping than that adopted during the last Parliament. Would it, therefore, be more acceptable? Three distinct and decisive considerations lead to a negative answer. The first is that it would probably encounter the determined opposition of those whose ultimate ideal is a Single Chamber, and who would rather persist with the weak and discredited body that at present exercises an arbitrary Veto than proceed to the constitution of a new and strong body firmly rooted in the representative principle. In point of fact, it was experience of the impossibility of obtaining agreement upon the lines of reconstruction which led the Government in 1907 to concentration on the Veto. There is no reason to think that those difficulties would be less to-day. Beyond this, there is the radical and, in our view, the true and sound objection that a body thus framed would tend to overshadow the authority of the House of Commons, and ultimately present to it a rival force, superficially attractive by reason of its apparent intellectuality, but really concentrating all the most conservative elements in the country. Neither Irish Nationalism nor English Laborism would take one step forward in such a direction.

The second reason is that one scheme, and only one scheme, has been before the country. Everywhere the Veto has been argued by Liberal and Labor candidates, everywhere voters have been asked to concentrate on that point alone, and in many places it cannot be doubted that those who would normally have supported Labor candidates have sacrificed their preferences for the sake of one object, which was represented to them as simple and supreme. There are plenty of alternative ways of handling the question. But none of these have been before the country, and for leaders who have put one scheme before the country, and have won on it, to change after the victory and substitute another would be a course calculated to undermine their authority.

This brings us at once to the third objection, which is that any scheme of reconstruction must be an involved and complicated affair. Hence to the supporters of the Government it means another big Bill after the model of the last Parliament, another long drawn out series of discussions, and at the end—summary execution. It means the familiar process of ploughing the sands, and neither Liberals, nor Labor men nor Irishmen are in the mood to plough the sands. True, as we have shown above, the Referendum might save it from this fate. But that process, if linked with an elaborate scheme of reform, would only come at the end of long, wearying, and uncertain controversy. After what has passed the opponents of the House of Lords and, most particularly, the Irish will require a more immediate and decisive test. What they demand is the production of the promised scheme for the limitation of the Veto, free from dilatory complications, and an immediate decision on the question. On such a decision the destiny of the Government would doubtless have to be staked. But if beaten, the democratic parties would still remain a fighting force, united in pursuit of a common object. They would not have suffered the more deadly injury of internal distrust and open discredit.

The immediate object of the Government must be to restore confidence—that is to say, to prove to all its supporters that it means to persist in the attack announced at the Albert Hall. It must prove to those who put the constitutional question above all others that to support the Government is the way, and the only way, to get the constitutional question settled. With this object it will do well, in our opinion, to embody its proposals for the double limitation of the Veto in a resolution from which all extraneous matter is excluded, and to submit that resolution to the judgment of both Houses. Assuming, as is probable, that that resolution is adopted by a large majority in the one House and rejected in the other, the situation arises which Mr. Asquith postulates as the necessary condition for approaching the problem of a constitutional settlement of the divergence between the Houses. If the problem were handled in such a way as to convince all parties of the sincerity of the Government, the immediate difficulties would, we believe, be overcome.

A FUTILE CONTROVERSY.

A MORE wanton waste of Parliamentary time than this week's debate on Tariff Reform can hardly be conceived. For Protectionists the prospect is definitely worse, not better, than when this same straggling and inconsistent amendment was debated a year ago. We were then in the trough of a trade depression with its accompanying unemployment. Upon these misfortunes of their country Tariff Reformers built great hopes, now dashed to the ground by the trade revival which is visible in almost every quarter. The General Election has, indeed, placed in the House of Commons a larger body of professed Protectionists, but the disastrous failure of their attempt to break the solidarity of the industrial North must have brought dismay to those among them endowed with any measure of political sagacity. In more adventurous moments Tariff Reformers have turned to Ireland as a natural ally in their adventure. But Irish Protectionism is an integral part of Irish Nationalism, as Mr. Kettle pointed out. Unless Mr. Austen Chamberlain and his friends are willing to concede an even further measure of Home Rule than Liberals at present contemplate, giving Ireland the right to levy a 10 per cent. import duty upon English goods, no such deal is possible.

With pompous formality Mr. Austen Chamberlain paraded the false assertions and fallacious reasoning which have been ringing in our ears from a thousand platforms. There was the same audacious "talk" about unemployment as "a chronic, continuous symptom of our social system," due to Free Trade, from which Protectionist nations are free, and for which a tariff would furnish a remedy! Agriculture and the great industries are affording less proportionate employment to our people than formerly; capital, needed here, is flowing abroad, to which Mr. Mackinder adds the statement that labor is following capital in its journey overseas. Protection does not favor trusts, and if it does, a national is better than an international trust. Such is the staple of an argument consisting entirely of unproved and unprovable assertions.

Tariff Reform, we are still assured, will increase the volume of British production by keeping out foreign goods. It will also raise our revenue by letting in foreign goods. The foreigner will pay the tax, and so prices will not be raised to our consumers, but profits will be larger for our home producers in agriculture and manufacture, because, though they charge no higher prices than before, they will earn profits on a larger turnover. For, though foreign goods must still flow in to yield a revenue, they must stay out in order to secure to us our home market. Though the price of wheat must rise in order to give a profitable stimulus to Colonial and British agriculture (the Colonies being, apparently, exempt from the economic law that the foreigner pays the tax), the price of bread must remain as before. If, however, the price of bread did rise, "your food," as a whole, would not cost you more, because the present food taxes could be remitted, though we observe that on this somewhat delicate topic Mr. Chamberlain did not dwell, preferring to plunge his audience into the trivialities of an impracticable comparison between German and British standards of living.

Mr. Buxton and other speakers patiently pricked these sophisms of Mr. Chamberlain with pointed facts. The worst unemployment remains in shipbuilding and the building trades, which Protection can only touch to damage. The average price for wheat in Germany last December showed an excess over the English price of 12s. 5d. for imported wheat, 14s. for native wheat, showing that the home producer charged the consumer not merely with the addition of the duty, but with a considerable surplus. But effective as these answers are, it seems hardly suitable that our House of Commons, at a time when it is confronted with such grave issues of immediate moment, should occupy itself with such vain and irrelevant discussion. For seven years we have had these debates going on, with no real attempt on the part of Tariff Reformers to defend their logic or their fictions: shifted from one position they move to another, and when the other is made untenable they simply shift back again. They have taken no steps towards securing any one of their argumentative bases. They have never attempted to prove how a tariff can increase the aggregate of employment in the protected area; or how it can keep more capital in the country; how the foreigner can be made to pay, or what form his payment takes; how Protection can secure the home market and retain our profitable export trade; or why it is more advantageous for us to take the payment for our exports in more raw material and less foreign manufactured goods than at present. With brazen effrontery they lay down these theoretical propositions, and proceed to build upon them elaborate edifices of fiscal policy. But they never endeavor seriously to defend them. Why? Because all this argumentation belongs, not to the substance, but to the rhetorical decoration of their case. There may be honestly convinced Tariff Reformers among our semi-educated classes, never trained to think; country clergymen, half-pay officers, a scattering of university men, country gentlemen, and other men of property and leisure, mostly attracted, in the first instance, by the breezy, or shall we say windy, Imperialism on which the Birmingham statesman first floated his scheme, have grown into a genuine attachment to a policy which is going to "save the country." We respect the motives of these Tariff Reformers, but they live outside reasonable controversy.

Such controversy, however, is scarcely better adapted to deal with the business politicians who are actually running this campaign. Insincerity is, perhaps, an impossible charge to fasten on to a politician. But our impression is that most of the engineers in this propaganda attach little value to the economic formulæ they have devised, and by no means rely upon them for any other purpose than for getting votes at elections. Protectionism in this country, as elsewhere, is not primarily a political creed; it is a business scheme by means of which certain organised trades design, by using such political pulls as they possess or can procure, to pass legislation and impose taxation favorable to their pockets. No one who has studied the process of tariff-making in those new countries, such as the United States or Canada, where business forces work naked and unashamed, can doubt that a rigorously economic interpretation of this particular phase of national history is fully justified. This fact thrown a flood of light upon the position taken by Birmingham and its area of influence in the Tariff Reform movement. This district of numerous metal industries, exposed to the full force of foreign competition, has most to gain by a tariff which should secure its market by protective duties, always provided that this initial gain is not lost by a too wide extension of protective favors to other trades producing goods and raw materials. The political machine for which Birmingham is famous was excellently adapted to promote the furtherance of such a scheme. Tariff Reform is frankly adopted as "good business" by Birmingham, and if some flavor of Imperialistic enthusiasm can help to float a profitable project, it is not difficult to find it here in the home of the great Empire-builder who, at a cost of some three hundred millions to his fellow-countrymen, claims to have added a new nation to the Britain across the seas. If to this simple account of Tariff Reform we add the more distinctively political consideration that it is needed as an alternative proposal to the Radical taxation of unearned and superfluous wealth, we need not stray very far from our economic interpretation. Regarded in this light it is merely a base and impudent attempt to shift the burden of maintaining the State from the shoulders of the rich on to those of the poor.

AN EGYPTIAN TERRORIST.

THE first imitation in Egypt of the methods by which Indian terrorists are attempting to demoralise their British rulers inevitably sets the mind to tracing parallels. It was, indeed, a native Prime Minister, and not a British official, who fell to the assassin's revolver. But the offence of Boutros Ghali Pasha was, ultimately, that the Nationalists saw in him an agent of the British occupation. They struck at their foreign masters through him. There are pitfalls enough in the way of any comparison between India and Egypt. The total absence in Egypt of any hereditary fighting caste with a tradition of physical courage, the relative immaturity in intellect and education of the educated class as compared with the best type of the Indian "intellectual," the rapid increase of wealth and the absorption of wealthy natives in land speculation and other profitable ways of improving the situation which the foreigner has made—all these things tend to make our position on the Nile incomparably easier than it is in India. There is to be set, on the other side of the account, only the fact that our coming is still recent and our title insecure. Our rule has not assumed for the mass-mind, as it has in India, the inevitability of a long settled fact, the sanction of a decree of destiny. But, with all the differences, the underlying difficulty is the same—the simple, instinctive objection of one race to be ruled by another. From that fundamental impulse has sprung the terrorism of the Extremists in India. It is probable that their example has incited the crime of this week in Egypt.

The discovery that the younger Nationalists are prepared to proceed from words to deeds will probably surprise the most those who really knew them best. The fear of some mass outbreak of fanaticism, to which Lord Cromer's school gave currency before and after the Denshawai incident, had never, we believe, a basis in probability. The Nationalist movement, even on the least favorable reading, was not a fanatical movement, despite its occasionally compromising relations with Yildiz Palace and the old régime in Turkey. It was an emphatically modern movement. Its leaders were men of Western education, with the usual tendency of the instructed Mohammedan to scepticism. Their demands were for a Constitution and for vernacular schools. Their one weapon was the Press. It was from among the educated, Europeanised class that they drew their adherents. Outside the towns their propaganda had made little stir, and of the genuine old-fashioned peasant they knew hardly more than did the last to arrive of the English officials. The only real risk was the growth of terrorism. Terrorism is the method of the isolated intellectual, and in India, as in Russia, he resorts to it because he despairs of rousing any mass movement fervid enough to pass from words to deeds. The thing was in the air two years ago, when the writer was in Cairo. Officials talked of it as a development which might come, if the emotional thermometer continued to rise. Students talked of it, lightly and publicly, as a thing which must, and ought, to come. So open, so noisy, so incautious was this talk, that no one who had ever met real conspirators under a genuine tyranny could dream of taking it seriously. It was laughable that young men who were, in fact, so free that they could almost publicly talk terrorism, should dream of resorting to the desperate remedy which, in Europe, has always been reserved for the moment when every other means of protest is forbidden. One saw nothing, moreover, in the conduct or bearing of these young men, to suggest that they had the courage or devotion necessary in the man who risks his own life to take that of another. They seemed to be mere talkers, incapable even of organising an efficient party. The two years which have passed since then have only seen the progressive demoralisation of the Nationalists. They have found no competent leader since the death of Mustafa Kamel, and they were incapable of profiting even by the stimulus to all Nationalist causes in the East which the Young Turkish triumph should naturally have been. It is consistent with all that can be deduced from the history of similar movements, that Egyptian Nationalism should turn in its demoralisation and degeneration to terrorism. When in such a party the few who are reckless and keen see around them only lethargy and self-seeking, they are tempted to trust to the criminal deed which a single hand can achieve.

A notable and beneficent change has come over the spirit of the Egyptian Administration since Lord Cromer's departure. The native officials, whether Ministers or provincial governors, have been allowed to exercise some measure of authority. The consultative Legislative Council has been encouraged to make its debates more public and more thorough. The anglicising of the schools has been checked, and a National University founded in embryo. Above all, the Khedive, on whom fell the heaviest weight of Lord Cromer's hand, has been gently and tactfully handled. But, given the temper in which the Egyptian Nationalists regarded the occupation, the inevitable has followed. They do not see in all this a tentative stage on the road to self-government. They regard it rather as a belated and insidious attempt to debauch their ruling class, and to create among it an Anglophile party. The Khedive who, thanks to no qualities of his own, was rather a favorite while he stood at the head of Lord Cromer's black list, is now intensely unpopular, and it has even become a Nationalist pastime to hoot him in the streets. The meaning of the assassination of the inoffensive and respectable Coptic Premier, Boutros Pasha, is primarily, we imagine, that it is either a blind expression of resentment at this fraternisation between the ruling class and its English masters, or else a calculated attempt to intimidate the ruling class into assuming a more national attitude. Boutros Pasha, an official who had always carried out the policy of the occupation, was obnoxious on several grounds. He had a share in the Soudan Convention, he acquiesced in the proceedings of the Denshawai court-martial, but, above all, he was at the time of his death attempting to modify the Suez Canal Concession in a way which the Nationalists profoundly resent. The canal at present brings in no revenue to Egypt, but in 1967 its concession expires, and it will become the property of the Egyptian Government. Mr. Harvey proposed to extend the concession for a further term of forty years, in return for some immediate share in the present profits of the company. The arrangement seems to us a reasonable plan for obtaining a development fund which might, without fresh taxation, be used for fruitful ends. But the Nationalists are inevitably suspicious. The Canal in their minds is bound up with the occupation, and this plan impressed them chiefly as a crafty device for perpetuating the intervention of the foreigner. Boutros Pasha fell to this suspicion—to our minds a peculiarly silly suspicion. For if it is the need of guarding the Canal which excuses the occupation, that need would not be lessened when the Canal became the property of an Oriental State.

The effects of such a deed as this can only be deplorable. It probably will succeed in intimidating the Khedive and his entourage. If in consequence they lose what little self-reliance they now possess, the progress of self-government is checked. If they are galvanised into an unnatural self-assertion, then their English "advisers" will resume in full their old authority. The choice of a policy is very difficult. If Sir Eldon Gorst attempts to work through the Khedive and the bureaucracy, he exposes them to popular resentment. If he "trusts the people" and tries to create a Parliamentary system, he is confronted by the hopeless immaturity and unreason of the dominant Nationalist party. The errors of Lord Cromer's period are bearing their natural fruit. He neglected education, to concentrate on finance. He created a foreign bureaucracy, and did nothing to develop the capacity of governing in native officials. The result is a weak ruling class, a foolish lettered class, and an inert illiterate mass. Through all these strata there seethes a certain vague jealousy of foreign rule, a partially organised and badly guided aspiration for self-rule. There is only a choice of evils. But of the evils, the lesser is, we think, to begin cautiously the development of a Parliamentary régime. Checks and safeguards would be indispensable for many years to come. But in ten years the schoolboys of to-day will be men. To create a really liberal system of education is to take the first and the longest step towards the solution of the Egyptian question. The plan of proceeding by developing provincial institutions has never seemed to us promising. No concession will placate the unrest or rally the Moderates, which fails to recognise the Egyptian nation as a unity moving towards the control of the central government.

Life and Letters.

THE TWO ENGLANDS.

WHEN Disraeli, in his "Sybil," applied the phrase "two nations" to the social cleavage between the gentry and the working classes, it would never have occurred to him to draw a sharp line of geographical demarcation. Mrs. Gaskell's imagination and keen popular sympathies were, indeed, powerfully impressed by the contrast between the soft and picturesque feudalism of the Southern counties and the bare, grim, striving realism of the new Lancashire beginning to assert its proud claim to be "the workshop of the world." But the full political significance of the contrast still lay in the tolerably distant future. For the narrow restriction of the franchise kept the control of politics in the hands of the aristocracy and the middle classes, and the profitable, though expensive, game between ruling Whig and Tory families was played according to time-honored rules at each General Election. The populace had very little "say," though the rumblings of a slow-wakening Demos in the great chaotic factory and mining regions of the North and Midlands began at times to disturb the dreams of the nobles, sporting squires, and new industrial magnates who ruled England. The several extensions of the franchise since the great Reform period, though shifting the balance of political parties so as to make Liberalism more and more identical with industrial Britain, Conservatism with rural Britain, never made the geographical cleavage very clean and clear until the General Election of this year. A glance at the electoral maps showing the division of parties even after 1885, when it might be thought that the political opposition between the well-to-do classes and the workers had been made tolerably manifest, exhibits no plain, consistent testimony to the contrast between North and South, which stands out in glaring color from the latest record of electoral opinion.

The explanation is, of course, that the current of our politics has never run in any logical bed of clear, conscious ideas or interests. Though "the condition of the people," and the achievement of certain plain demands of humanity and justice disclosed by the pressure of heavy grievances ought, in theory, to have dominated political procedure ever since household franchise was obtained, this has not been the case. Secondary issues of domestic policy, grave conflicts due to the composite nature of our Empire and its aggrandisement, have served, decade after decade, to delay and to distract the deep moving forces which made for a division of political parties along lines of industrial geography. The slump of Imperialism which succeeded the disillusionment of the Boer War, the long spell of unbroken peace in Europe, the discord and unreality disclosed in what we may term the typical middle-class issues of education, temperance, and disestablishment, have brought to the front of practical politics with a rush a series of potent working-class demands for land and industrial reforms, for public provision against poverty and unemployment by honest and effective remedies, and for a finance which shall relieve the workers from injurious taxation, deriving the public revenue from the unearned and superfluous incomes of the well-to-do. The political field, being for a few years clear from other distracting issues, this array of working-class demands has had opportunity to shape itself into something like a coherent social-political scheme. To the rich and privileged classes, and their intellectual mercenaries, it is the spectre "Socialism" advancing to lay unhallowed hands upon the sanctities of private property, and to bring the entire social fabric to the ground. Nor is it wholly unnatural that the demands of the enfranchised workers should have this appearance to the uneducated upper classes in our Southern pleasure towns and our cathedral cities, to the West End clubman and the London city man, whose personal contact with the human factors of industrial England is too slight and too remote to protect his mind against the emotional suggestions of his scare-press.

We are not concerned to deny that there is some substance in his fears. We hope there is; for the contrast between the two Englands, disclosed so dramatically by this General Election, points to a state of facts and feelings which constitutes a real danger to our State. Wherever industrialism is organised and concentrated, upon the great coalfields of Lancashire and Yorkshire, Derbyshire, Northumberland, and Durham, not to mention South Wales, the greatest intensity of Liberalism and Laborism is found. The textile, machine-making, and mining constituencies yield, almost invariably, the largest Liberal majorities, carrying with them, in most instances, the neighboring semi-agricultural electorates. Scotland and the Northern counties in England, Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Derbyshire, and Cheshire, return 175 Liberal and Labor men to 54 Unionist. Hardly less concentrated is the Unionist force in the Home and Southern Counties. Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Hertfordshire, and Huntingdon are held entirely by them, while Middlesex and Warwickshire show only one Liberal seat. All the old cathedral cities, excepting one or two large industrial centres, such as Durham, Norwich, and York, nearly every dockyard and service town, the watering-places, and other pleasure resorts, the county towns throughout the South, the old market towns, controlling so many Southern constituencies, cast substantial majorities for the Unionists. But it is needless to labor the facts of what amounts to a new political situation. In substance, it is the setting of consumers' England against producers' England.

We do not, of course, suggest that the bulk of the electorate in the Southern counties are not engaged in working for their living. But the social organisation and the character of the South are determined, to a predominant degree, by the well-to-do and largely leisured classes, who use this part of England as a place of residence and a playground in which their socially reputable sports and pastimes and their "social functions" may be conducted with dignity and pleasure. The incomes expended by this leisure class are dissociated from any present exertions on their part, and are mainly derived from the investments in industrial England or in other countries. The professions and industries which flourish in the South are, in the main, dependent upon the expenditure of these parasitic classes. Moreover, this dependence is tolerably conscious, leading, in the more desirable residential districts, to a new feudalism, in which the will and the demands of the moneyed class openly determine and control the occupations of the people, who consist mostly of retail traders, small tenant farmers, with ill-paid laborers, and numbers of small local industries supplying the requirements of local consumers. The only large, widespread industry, building, is, in structure and operation, separated from the great manufacturing and mining trades, and its instability weakens the independence of its employés. All over the South there is a great gulf between gentry and working-classes, which a class of peculiarly servile shopkeepers does little to bridge.

How different is the external structure and the spirit of society in the North! Though everywhere there exists a well-to-do class, it is largely engaged in organising and directing industry, and remains in close personal and human contact with the masses of the people. Nor does it exercise, either by its money, its social prestige, or its habits and valuations, a degree of control which approaches that exercised by the class of "conspicuous leisure" and "ostentatious waste" in the South. For the actual predominance in the industrial North is held by a force which has no existence in the South, the great associated artisan class, the comparatively well-paid, intelligent, and energetic groups of factory operatives, miners, foundrymen, engineers, and other workers whose conditions of employment and of living evoke energy of mind and educate them in habits of co-operative action towards common ends.

This new force of associated labor has been slow and reluctant to adopt the machinery of party politics as a necessary instrument for the attainment of its ends. It is only within the last decade that the necessity of a definitely political activity has firmly imposed itself upon the mind of all seriously disposed working-class leaders. The recent election discloses the first-fruits of this plain resolve. Vainly does the Southern Tory politician wave before this mass-mind of organised labor the tariff flag, contrived and colored so as to lure him from his plain path of advance. The unskilled workers in the Southern cities, prey to the publican and servile to the sway of the "hall," are won over in shoals to the protective device which represents the post-bellum endeavor to captivate the imagination of the workers and divert them from the threatened reform of "property" which is involved everywhere in the new Radicalism. The wisdom of the people, which comes into being and expresses itself through organised association, has shown itself here a powerful prophylactic. The united voice of the industrial North has even impressed the ears of the South: parasitism is, from its very nature, timid. It would take little to convert this timidity into panic. It is, however, to be hoped that timidity may yield to discretion, and not provoke the fiercer political spirit of the North. We do not think that the Government itself has yet fully realised the magnitude of this new controlling force in progressive politics, the obligations it imposes, and the new power it generates for the execution of those labors of constitutional and social reform to which the Ministry is formally committed,

KING'S ENGLISH.

In the respectable days of Queen Victoria, it was a common reproach among cultivated circles to say that someone could not speak "Queen's English." The reproach sometimes fell on a man who, by his industry and wits, had risen from the position of workman to be head of a factory or other "concern," and was devoting the energies of old age to enjoying the greatest happiness that money can buy. But more often it fell upon the woman who had risen at his side, and now either disregarded her aspirates altogether or rose at them painfully, as a bad hunter rises at a fence and scrapes the top bar. The reproach implied that the person had not mixed with elegant society in youth, had been at one time poor, and was indifferently brought up among people careless of grammar and accustomed to some local accent, the Irish and Scottish accents alone being acquitted of vulgarity, owing to their natural beauty and romantic associations.

"Queen's English" was the standard of correctness. It was the natural language of the genteel—the people who were slower than others at rhyming "knowledge" with "college," or sounding the aspirate in "humble." Whether, since the late Queen's death, the phrase "King's English" has come into use for expressing the same distinction, we are not quite sure. We have not heard it so employed, perhaps because fastidious exactness is becoming merged in the jumble and hurry of motor traffic and compulsory education. Or it may be there is a certain daintiness about a feminine monarch that no Salic Law can command, and that a male succession excludes; just as, with pitying admiration, one may call some ill-mannered but honest fellow-creature a "nature's gentleman." But no one to this day has ever ventured to describe any woman as a "nature's lady." Still, if we spoke about "King's English" at all, it would evidently signify the finest, the most cultivated, the most correct form of our language—such perfect utterance as the little cabin-boy would expect to hear from the King of whom he sang:—

"Soon we'll be in London Town,
See the King in his golden crown;
Sing, my lads, yo ho!"

But if that little cabin-boy had been to Parliament and heard a King's Speech, what a shock he would have received! Better for him to die prattling his ditty, with his sweet blue eyes turned up to the cockpit roof, as was described in many a melting drawing-room while the song held the fashion. Mr. Balfour is no blue-eyed cabin-boy; he has frequently seen the King in his golden crown; he is as hardened to "King's English" as a lodging-house servant is to her lover's Cockney. Yet a King's Speech is almost too much for him. Last Monday he complained bitterly of what he called that amazing piece of English. He spoke of the "ambiguities lurking in that remarkable specimen of our mother tongue"; he doubted if one passage had any meaning at all, though "it appeared to embody two quite different policies which had no connection whatever, except that it had been found possible to force them into the framework of one ungrammatical sentence." He even quoted "some unkind person" who said the King's Speech is always more stupid than the most stupid man in the Ministry, and he suggested that the grammar of it is sometimes worse than that of the most illiterate man in the Cabinet. But in the end, being hardened to "King's English," as we said, he put it all aside as a thing of small importance. "I do not think it much matters," he admitted, "whether the Government have put good or bad grammar into his Majesty's mouth, because Ministers, and not his Majesty, are responsible."

Will the Leader of his Majesty's Opposition allow the prerogatives of the Crown thus to be curtailed? Is bad grammar to be put into the King's mouth whether he likes it or not? Commanding the Army and Navy, is he to have no command of his own tongue? It is not to the measure of the most illiterate man in the Cabinet that the ideal of "King's English" has been built, and it cannot be a matter of small importance whether the popular ideal of correct language shall be maintained. "He who writes badly thinks badly," said Cobbett, in one of his six letters, "intended to prevent statesmen from using false grammar, and from writing in an awkward manner".—

"The bad writing, on which I am about to remark, I do not pretend to look on as the cause of the present public calamities, or any part of them" (he was writing in June, 1822); "but it is a proof of a deficiency in that sort of talent which appears to me to be necessary in men entrusted with great affairs. He who writes badly thinks badly. Confusedness in words can proceed from nothing but confusedness in the thoughts which gave rise to them. These things may be of trifling importance when the actors move in private life; but when the happiness of millions of men is at stake, they are of importance not easily to be described."

We altogether deny that confusedness in words and in thoughts is a matter of trifling importance when the actors move in private life. Indeed, our chief complaint against the abuses of "King's English" is that they encourage such confusedness throughout the country down to the very poorest board schools. But certainly it is surprising that the most confused and laborious specimens of our language should be found in those pronouncements upon which the happiness of millions of men depends—the pronouncements uttered by the King in his official capacity, or issued in his name. Till it comes to "King's English," most people can say what they want to say intelligibly. The language which ought to be the model of expression has become the greatest hindrance to lucidity. The fact may be proved from all Acts of Parliament, laws, legal documents, proclamations, and many Ministerial utterances besides the King's Speech. One remembers how Matthew Arnold took the language of some Land Act to illustrate the impossibility of any genuine reconciliation between the English authors of it and a humorous, clear-witted people like the Irish. One remembers, also, that article in the marriage settlement of Tristram Shandy's mother, beginning, "And this Indenture further witnesseth," and proceeding for full five pages of engrossed handwriting to the sentence:—

"AND ALSO the advowson, donation, presentation, and free disposition of the rectory or parsonage of Shandy aforesaid, and all and every the tenths, tithes, glebe-lands"—In three words—"My mother was to lie in (if she chose it) in London."

This kind of language was, perhaps, originally adopted to avoid legal disputations arising from the omission of some rent, reversion, service, annuity, fee-farm, knights' fee, view of frankpledge, escheat, relief, mine, quarry, goods and chattels of felons and fugitives, felons of themselves, and put in exigent, deodand, free warren, or any other royalty and seigniery, right and jurisdiction, privilege and hereditament whatsoever. And it has been maintained, in order that litigants may feel they have something to show for their money, and that lawyers, like the Egyptian priests when they maintained their hieroglyphics, may have money to show for something. Partly, also, it is maintained, in the hope of impressing the illiterate with the majesty of the Law, which requires all that sonorous magnificence of time and space to express itself adequately; and thus it fulfils the same function as the judge's black cap, or the town crier's appeal for attention when he rings his bell and shouts, "O yes! O yes!"

Sometimes it may happen that a statesman deliberately falls into "King's English" of this quality on the chance that its obscurity may in the future favor his escape from some apparent pledge; for, under the stress of political necessity, what is more convenient than to slip away from the more obvious meaning into the refuge afforded by an alternative interpretation? But as to the King's Speeches in particular, we believe the peculiarities of their style to be due to the method of their composition. We understand that when the variegated opinions of the Cabinet have at last been knocked into some common agreement, the chief points are entrusted to the Downing Street butler to put together, in accordance with the established precedent that has slowly broadened down from Premier to Premier. There is a uniformity in the style that points to a hereditary tradition, if not to a single hand. In that same "Grammar of the English Language" to which we have already referred, William Cobbett analyses the King's Speech of 1814, and he detects in it exactly the same errors of grammar and expression as may be discovered in subsequent King's Speeches up to what Mr. Balfour described as that "amazing piece of English" last Monday. "There is not," he says, "in the whole Speech one single sentence that is free from error." Yet he believed that "each of the Ministers had a copy of the Speech to read, to examine, and to observe upon."

"Though a man," he continues, "may possess great knowledge, as a statesman and as a legislator, without being able to perform what the poet would call writing well; yet, surely we have a right to expect in a Minister the capacity of being able to write grammatically; the capacity of putting his own meaning clearly down upon paper. But in the composing of a King's Speech it is not one man, but nine men, whose judgment and practical talent are employed."

Then, taking the Speech line by line, he goes on to show "what pretty stuff is put together, and delivered to the Parliament, under the name of King's Speeches." Similarly, we can imagine him taking even our shortest King's Speech on record, and pointing out such little errors as that "the establishment of the Union of South Africa has been fixed at the end of May," where "fixed for the end" should be read. Or, again, in the fourth paragraph, the words, "I contemplate this visit, when My son will have the privilege, &c.," should read, "during which My son." And, in the same paragraph, the words, "[My son] will convey to South Africa, on behalf of Myself and the Empire, our ardent prayers for the welfare," &c., imply a strange religious perversion, for, when we pray for the sick, we do not convey our prayers to the hospital, but offer them directly unto God, who is as near us here as in the next street. So, again, at the beginning of the following paragraph, where the King is made to say, "In conformity to the important measure," every educated subject would say, "in conformity with." And as to those paragraphs of which Mr. Balfour appears chiefly to have complained, it would take pages of discussion fully to explain the possible meanings of such phrases as: "serious difficulties, due to recurring differences of strong opinion," and "these Measures, in the opinion of My advisers, should provide that this House" (meaning in grammar the House of Commons, but in reality the House of Lords), "should be so constituted and empowered," &c.

If we must drop the supposition of the Downing-Street butler, we can only suppose that what Cobbett considered an additional advantage in the framing of a King's Speech, is actually a hindrance, and the chief cause of its obscurity and bad grammar. It is not one man, he says, but nine men, whose judgment and practical talent are employed. That is just the worst of it. A committee can no more write a letter than it can write an ode. Too many cooks spoil the menu, and in the multitude of counsellors there may be Wisdom, but there is never Style.

"CHOPIN VILLA."

THE name of Chopin carries with it to each of us its own peculiar associations. To some this son of a French father, born one hundred years ago this week, the exiled child of an exile, stands, by some paradox, for Poland. To others it is linked, by all the ties of gossip and the immortality of literary scandal, to the fading memory of George Sand. To the writer it suggests a prim, stuccoed villa among the hesitating trees and vanishing fields of a London suburb. A little lady lived there, stiffer and primmer than the stucco of her villa. Her grey curls perpetuated the vanities of the Regency. Her ample skirts of silk seemed always to demand a shadowy crinoline. Miss Brown had been my mother's teacher, and the elegance of her retirement betrayed itself in the name which stared in bold lettering among the drooping laburnums of her porch. "Chopin Villa" kept alive the memory of a vanished epoch, and rebuked by its sedate romance the contemporary vulgarities around it. The cool drawing-room, with its pruderies and refinements, summed up the spirit of an age. The long windows admitted their floods of light, as though to defy the least suggestion of hidden dirt. There were chairs on which no one might sit, and tables which no one used. The wall-papers suggested the pattern of a silken gown. Wax fruit under a glass case adorned an alabaster table. Water-colors after Birket Foster hung on the walls between portraits of Victoria and Albert. On the shelves the grim verses of Eliza Cook stood side by side with the gentler romance of Mrs. Hemans. The albums and annuals in which that age delighted, "The Moss Rose," "Friendship's Garland," and I know not how many "Gems of Literature," exhaled their thin fragrance and displayed their faded colors behind the locked glass door of the book-case. Twice a day, until at last the old fingers grew too stiff and the old eyes too blind, Miss Brown sat down to the cottage piano, with its front of pleated silk. In the morning, when her house-work was decently accomplished, she played a waltz or mazurka of Chopin. In the evening, when the ritual of tea had been fulfilled and the Venetian blinds pulled down, a nocturne punctually broke the cheerful silence of that pink and saffron room. For Miss Brown the evolution of music had ceased with Chopin's Funeral March. Once a year, and once only, on the solemn anniversary, it, too, was played, the only break in a round observed as carefully as the reading of morning and evening prayer.

What was it that so endeared Chopin to the most correct of Early Victorian ladies? He had none of the obvious recommendations of Mendelssohn. He was not a Protestant, nor even a converted Jew. He had never been a favorite at any virtuous Court. He wrote no sacred music. Chopin's appeal was precisely to all that side of life which the Early Victorian repressed in practice to idolise in imagination. It was so easy to link romantic tales with his waltzes, but, above all, with his Nocturnes. Miss Brown was never tired of the exercise. If she had a favorite, it was that solemn and beautiful lament, where there occurs a ghostly chorale, which sings its muffled harmonies like the night chanting of spectral monks in a ruined cloister. The little boy who frequented "Chopin Villa" to hear her playing in the uncertain light of summer evenings, shivered with a horrible joy as she explained with irresistible conviction how this particular nocturne referred to the ghost of a guilty nun, mured up in a ruined convent, which was haunted at night by choirs of chanting monks. He has often reflected in later life that if Miss Brown had met that erring nun in the flesh, she would have drawn in her stiff silken skirts with a very decisive movement, and crossed to the other side of the road. But there is a fascination in the guilt of ghosts. One is not compromised by condoning their sins. In the brisk and orderly existence of Miss Brown, the dreamy yet passionate sadness of all this music was the other half of life, the indispensable compensation for long years of regularity and self-discipline. At her work-box, while she sorted out her silks and arranged her needles, she was of all British maiden-ladies the most impeccable and correct. The wild world of fancy and emotion claimed her at the cottage-piano, and in Chopin she found it in a form which stirred the emotions without shattering the heart, and stimulated the fancy without setting the feet in motion. Twice a day to these exotic rhythms she played in waltz or mazurka her "Over the hills and far away" with endless variations. But so gentle, so subtle, so little disturbing was the music, that she never, in fact, felt so much as an impulse to take the horse-bus into town. One trembles to think what would have been the effect upon her sensitive nature of the later developments of Slavonic music. There are martial movements in Tchaikovsky which might have sent her post-haste to join the suffragettes. But Chopin sounded no call to action. Was he not an exile, himself resigned to a life of brooding? And Polish exiles were not to be confounded with some others of whom Miss Brown had heard. They were an aristocratic people. They wore no red shirts. They threw no bombs. If they could not recover the freedom of their country, they sat down to a piano in Paris in the politest way in the world, and expressed their melancholy in the most exquisite musical creations of our age.

It is, perhaps, because we all hear him still in the mental background of the Early Victorian drawing-room that Chopin's work seems to us to belong emphatically to the music that speaks with a dialect. It is not, indeed, Polish, as folk-tunes are Polish. It is like those Babylonian psalms, which are not Babylonian, though we hear in them the sound of the waters of captivity. Above all, it is the product of Paris in the full glamor of the romantic movement. One cannot forget that it was for the ears of Heine and Balzac, and for the critical appreciation of Berlioz, that these things were written. There is in them the conscious artifice of their period. One could set the Florentine Nights to the Nocturnes. It is a slighter and more graceful Byronism, this sentiment which is never sugary when it is sweetest, this pain which is never overmastering or mortal. The time for great architecture in music had gone by. The pride in form and construction had disappeared with the classical tradition that all the arts had simultaneously discarded. But as yet there was no great force of an insurgent message to create for itself new shapes of sound, or to restore and transform the old. The lesser dance forms were adequate for a mind which approached music, not from the intellectual, but from the emotional, side. Its triumph was to fashion from these prescribed forms, each with its necessary, its conventional, rhythm, an infinite variety of effect. They ring, to our modern ears, a little mannered, a little wilful in the elaborate beauty of their melancholy. It is as if a sigh had translated itself into the convolutions of some Moorish tracery. But it is a shallow criticism that would call them artificial. So it was that the world thought and felt in that time of hampered energies and fettered wills. The foundation of its life was the triumph of a sturdy and massive reaction. It danced sadly to its Polish tunes, because it could not march to the Marseillaise. It built its flimsy cobweb of romance round the stout pillars of Philistia, which no Samson had yet pulled to the ground. Its nerves and its fancies, its dreams and its melancholies, these were the relaxations of the orderly stucco villa, where still there reigned the rigidity of a punctual decorum. It was the time between Waterloo and '48. One thinks of Chopin and Heine as its typical singers. Both were exiles. But it was the longing for home which took them from home. In Paris they found the consolations of wit and sympathy, of love and fame, and the consequence was that they made the romantic tradition, with its imagined sorrows and its soothing melancholies. Had they stayed at home, they might have known the real tragedy of loneliness, the spiritual exile, and written with the passion and single-mindedness of a genuine sorrow. Chopin one cannot pity. Twice a day for fifty years the sweetest of maiden ladies played him reverently. She revelled in his wildness. She delighted in his lawlessness. She exulted, most of all, when she thought him barbaric and defiant. Yet never through all these years did his music do her the slightest harm. Ineffectual rebel! Innocuous Byron! George Sand shut you up while you lived in Minorca. Miss Brown chained your ghost in "Chopin Villa." That was the exile which you sought, the sorrow you deserved. And, secretly, you were very well content. But in "Chopin Villa" the Venetian blinds are down to-day. The jerry-builder has bought the site, and when next there comes round in the Calendar the solemn anniversary when the "Funeral March" was played, men shall pass and hear only the jolly ring of trowels as the bricklayer whistles some robust and everlasting melody—"The English Ploughboy" or "The British Grenadiers."

THE FERMENT.

"THE field has got the measles," cries a small girl just recovering from the popular spring complaint. She is right, for it has broken out everywhere into an irruption of mole-hills. We have been able to mark for weeks the industry of that underground population, as street after street has been added to the labyrinth beneath the grass. You can see the dry and fine-grained heaps that were thrown up last week and can trace the row through degrees of increasing freshness till, if you are quiet, you can see in the freshest of all the sausage of clay squeezing from the crown and tumbling lazily down the side of the "wunt-heave." Our little dog, Guess, knows the sign well enough, and can even catch the "wunt" himself, the microbe of the field's measles which some farmers think of with unreasoned abhorrence, and others with unreasoned kindness. The anti-moles begrudge the labor of scattering the heaps, while the pro-moles rejoice to think that the number of worms is being kept down. In truth the moles and the worms are rivals in the same good work of aerating, pulverising, and thus fertilising the soil.

The worms, as is well known, cultivate on a vastly greater scale than the moles. We have to look closer for the signs of their digging, but when they are found they are more striking than the work of the mole. The soil is brought up from even greater depths, and it is more finely treated, even predigested for the use of the plants. Darwin has estimated for us the amount of the earthworms' digging, and has told us that in ten years every particle of the field is renewed from below. If it were not for the worms, surely we should have to give our grass fields a double digging every five years, whereas our old pasture of a hundred years' undisturbed grass is the pride of the English grazier.

There is an object lesson at work in one or two town museums of nature study, that might well have a place in every village school to show more strikingly than by the light of statistics the great work of the earthworm. A glass jar is filled half-way up with light-colored sand on the top of which is an equal layer of leaf mould or garden loam. Then, in the presence of the class half-a-dozen earthworms are added and the date of the transaction affixed to the jar. In a very short time, streaks of sand run up through the mould and streaks of mould run down through the sand, and before a month has well passed the two ingredients of the jar are as well mixed as though a cook had stirred them. Yet the six-inch jar with a half-dozen worms is not a very exaggerated sample of the average field. We can dig nowhere without coming upon either the worm itself or the burrows from which it has eaten the soil and ejected it at the surface in finely masticated form. On a favorable night a few weeks hence you may see everywhere the foot-long forms of full-grown earthworms, stretched among the grass or flying back into the holes like elastic suddenly released, as the tails twitch them out of danger.

This surely makes us anti-moles. Why allow them to bring up the barren earth of underground and, at the same time, destroy by thousands daily the worms that will not only dig but fertilise? But we have seen that last week's mole-hill is not as to-day's. The air has slaked the round clay lumps till the mould runs through the fingers like coarse oatmeal. It must be finer than that for the plants' sake, and finer it shall be. Now that the spring airs are stirring we can find the first handfuls of earth that powders in the fingers to an impalpable, unclinging grease of fineness. The most unimaginative must see that here is something beyond mere mechanical fineness. It is chemical, or shall we hasten conjecture and say biological? The soil has caught life from the sun, an annual new creation that would stand for a new world from top to bottom, even if all other existing forms should perish in an instant. Here is the true irruptive principle that gives the field measles, the spots of which shall be buttercups and mauve lady's smocks and red ragged robin and blue scabious and white moon-daisies and purple prunella and the thousand other flowers of May.

Moles, one to the square lug, worms, one to the square foot, bacteria, anything from a thousand million to half a billion to the pounds of soil! In a few hours they can grow from hundreds to millions and billions. It is an incalculable saying, but something to account faintly for the fact that the soil that was yesterday lumps of clay is to-day alive. The roots of the old trees know it, and the seeds that have lain dormant all through the winter know it. There are the wandering bacilli, whose function it is simply to transform indigestible manure into pap for the little roots; there are bacilli of prey, some eating good microbes, some bad ones and some the indifferent, and there are those waiting to fasten on some special root that they have yet to meet. Dip a clover root into the mould and they will flock to it, forming on it the nodules that, long before the microscope and the agricultural laboratory, were guessed to have the power of extracting nourishment from the air. They are seemingly there for no good but their own. A weak plant succumbs to their too ardent attentions, yet in the main it is the clover that takes the upper hand. In fact, the clover cannot live without its very ancient parasite, of which it has made a servant.

Call and call again the trees, the grass, the flowers, the seeds, and they cannot get up till the ferments wake. The bacterium is the serving maid, who must get up and light the fire before the others can begin the day. The earth is aflame underground long before the eye sees it. The scientist dare not liken the spread of the bacterial population to, say, the breeding of a flock of sheep. He cannot say even that it is a phenomenon of life at all. The agricultural chemist calls the swarming millions by a name that signifies stuff rather than numbers. It is bacterine, even broth, as though we should call a trillion sheep a broth of mutton. It is not only mutton broth, but the broth of everything that has been or shall be. It is the indispensable beginning of life for this year, just as it was after chaos. It was the bacteria, then the fungi, the algae, the lichens, that dissolved the rocks and made of them mould in which fatter bacteria, and trees, and men could flourish. So the world could be obliterated, towers and pinnacles and all, by the simple expedient of destroying the "broth" of the soil.

For ourselves, we cannot tell where the tree ends and the soil begins. After the trunk there are the roots, the root-hairs, the micorhiza, the fungi, that are stationed on the roots, and the free fungi, that mean just so much to the topmost leaf on the tree as the leaves do themselves. In a cold frame we threw down some lettuce seed. The ill-prepared soil sprouted little patches of woolly mould. Rank enemy of man this, the stuff that cakes cheese or jam left in a damp cupboard; the bloom of rotting autumn; the very emblem of decay. Then the lettuce seeds swelled and burst, and there came out of them white roots, fringed thickly with white hairs, undistinguishable from the horrid mould of sour soil. But, on another morning, the roots had buried themselves, and every lettuce plant twinkled with two of the brightest green leaves. The roots had seen to it, the roots that came from the brown seeds, that perhaps were attacked by moulds from the air, which they defeated and enslaved, and made work for them in the soil.

Even the life of the tree is a ferment, and goes on for a while without assistance from the earth. The sycamore in the brush heap is sprouting just as much as the tree from which it was cut in autumn. The little catkins of the yew and the box have grown, not so much by force of this year's awakening, as in accordance with the programme laid down and provided for last summer. The sun stirs them before the roots need be waked. The million grains of pollen in each of them have evolved from a mass smaller than any of them, have hardened and dried so that the smallest shake sets them flying in the air. They are not millions of perfectly shaped carven spheres, as the microscope would have it, but just one of the scents of this balmy day. To the gnats dancing above the yew, they may be whirling stones that cannot be avoided and must be endured. To the waiting stigmas of their own kind they are as oxygen to hot iron, the thing that is thirsted for, and whose touch is destruction and change. Then they are myriads of stately trees that would in a short time clothe the whole country further than we can see—if it were not that thousands of other forms have each the same ambition. Out of their unspeakable war comes the peace of an English landscape.

THE FINDER.

THERE are hundreds of men walking the streets of London with their eyes fastened on the ground, and also their thoughts in the same place; so that things are no sooner lost than they are found. But it is of no use to have sharp eyes if one's thoughts are apt to wander.

I had often spoken to one man, but had not had any sustained conversation, until one morning he approached me with a letter in his hand, which he had found, and which he told me I could read. Rather surprised at this confidence, I took the letter and read it. But it was of no consequence whatever, being an ordinary friendly greeting from one woman to another, and whoever lost it would not have had much cause for grief. I told my new acquaintance this, and was surprised at his answer. "Whether it is of any value or not," he said, chuckling, "I intend to make something out of it. You may as well come that way for a walk, and we will return it to the owner." As a rule, I took my walks alone, so as to be at liberty to sit on seats and write, or go into libraries and read. However, on this occasion I decided to accompany my new friend.

As we were going through St. James's Park, he made a sudden dart forward, and picked up a silver pin. I noticed that his eyes were always on the ground, and I was now surprised that he wanted my company at all, for he spoke very little, and seemed quite indifferent to my voice.

At last we reached the West End, near Hyde Park, and, having found the letter's address—one of a row of very large houses—he went boldly to the front door and rang the bell. After inquiry for the lady of the house, and seeing her, he returned the letter, which she said was of little account. However, she thanked him for his trouble, and was about to close the door. But my new friend quickly explained that he thought the letter might have been of great importance, and that he had walked three miles to return it to the proper owner. Now, what else could this lady do, under these circumstances, than to thank him with more feeling, and to make the poor man a present of money?

These things my companion explained to me after he had delivered the letter. He also said that he had made quite a number of shillings in that simple way—by returning lost letters, some of which had actually been thrown away. In fact, he confessed, with a laugh, that on several occasions he had taken empty envelopes to houses, and received money for doing so. "This is only an envelope," a lady would say, smiling; "I have the letter safe." "I didn't know but what a note was inside," my artful companion would answer, innocently, "and have walked until I am tired so as to return it." Whatever a lady might think of this, she could not very well refuse to reward him for his trouble.

When we were on our way back, after delivering this lost letter, it was not long before he startled me by making another sudden jump, and this time he picked up a silver sixpence. "What a lucky man you are!" I exclaimed. "I don't believe there is one man in this large city with better eyesight than mine, and yet I never find anything." He was in such a good humor now that he became talkative, and that, I suppose, was the reason why he found nothing else.

When I became more intimate with this man, he called me one day to his locker, which he was in the act of cleaning. There were only three men in the kitchen at the time, and they were sitting at the far end. If there was the least likelihood of anyone else coming near to see the contents of his locker, it is most certain that he would not have called me. It was then that he began to show me the various things that he had found during his five years in London. And when I saw the things he had, I was astonished, for I believe the man could have made a small living by merely walking about. He had several fountain pens, one gold mounted, which must have cost twenty-five or thirty shillings. He showed me a gold pencil-case and two silver ones; also a silver matchbox, finely embossed, which still contained the matches, as it had been found. I saw several purses, all of which had contained money, and there was a lady's silk parasol, which had been left on a seat in one of the parks, and also a gentleman's costly cane, found in the same manner. He had dozens of fine linen handkerchiefs, which had been dropped, and, becoming dirty, would be passed by the poorest people, but which this very careful man had picked up and washed—fine, beautiful handkerchiefs, well worth picking up and washing. These he had saved, only using the common ones for his own use, for he could not tell what their quality was until they were washed. He showed me several articles of jewellery, such as rings, bracelets, and brooches, and one pendant, which was a silver cross with a Christ crucified in gold, which he had found one Sunday morning in Hyde Park. Even books—popular novels which ladies had left on the seats, some of which may not have been forgotten, but read and thrown away—were to be seen in this man's locker.

When I saw these, dozens and dozens of various articles, I was amazed. "You must find something every time you go out," I said, "to have amassed such a quantity as this." "Oh, no," he answered at once: "I often go a whole day without finding anything of the least value; but there are exceptional days, when I am sure to find several things. For instance, after a holiday, I go the next morning to a heath or common where a great number of people have been, and I am almost certain to find something of value, not to mention a number of things of little account, but still worth the trouble of finding. Of course, I am always on the spot as soon as it is daylight, for there are others that do the same."

This man must have had stuff that cost the owners a hundred pounds and more—things of gold and silver, things of silk, a fur muffler, and silk handkerchiefs; briar pipes, gloves, knives, pocket-books and reading books; purses which, it must be remembered, had contained money, and scores of other things of more or less value. For nothing was too small or common for him—he even picked up the ferules of umbrellas and walking-sticks.

I was surprised to hear that a great number of these things had been found in the parks, either having been dropped while walking or left by accident on the seats. I was surprised at this, because the parks were always full of vagrants. But after a while I considered the great advantage this man had over them, being fresh and active, whereas the poor vagrants would be either lying in the grass asleep or awake, but too tired to walk, seeing that they had been walking about sleepless all night.

What a strange man he was! for he never offered any of these things for sale, but kept them in his locker, and occasionally took pleasure in looking them over, taking great care that no lodgers were near to see them. His small income was enough to keep him, and, being indifferent to personal appearance, he therefore had little need of extra money. In fact, he kept himself looking like the commonest beggar, so that people would take less notice when they saw him stooping to pick things up.

I only accompanied him twice on his rambles, for I felt quite ashamed to see him continually stooping, and people looking at him all the time. In Regent Street he stooped so suddenly to pick up a halfpenny that a very fine lady, walking behind, fell across his back. This incident was quite enough for me, and I swore to myself that I would never go out with him again, and I kept my word.

I have always wondered at such a man as this, as to what kind of mind he had. He would have no thought of the past, nor of the future, for his mind had to be concentrated on the present moment. If he indulged in the least inclination to dream, he could not be a successful finder. He would see no beauty in the trees; they would only be obstacles, like houses. He would hear no birds, and never turn his head to see what made children laugh. His eyes would not waste one second on a girl's golden hair, for fear they would miss a brass pin on the ground.

STRAUSS AND HIS "ELEKTRA."

JUDGING from the tone of a number of last Monday's articles, our musical critics, as a whole, are still a little doubtful as to the propriety of saying what they must really feel about Strauss. They cannot possibly like a great part of what they hear, but at the back of their heads is the thought that, as Wagner was abused by the critics of his own day for extravagances that time has shown to be no extravagances at all, so time may show that Strauss was right in his extravagances, and that the critics who objected to them were wrong. So a number of the prudent gentlemen stay the flood of ridicule that is almost on their lips, and, instead, talk darkly of the future showing what it will show, and utter other safe commonplaces. All the while there is no real comparison between the Wagnerian case and the Straussian. All new music, from the mere fact that it is new, is apt to be misunderstood, and an idiom may seem wild or incoherent merely because we are not yet accustomed to it. But because the human ear has sometimes disliked a new thing and afterwards liked it, it does not follow that it will some day like everything that to-day it cordially dislikes. There are other things to be considered, and one of these is the fact that nowadays we are much better placed than our fathers were for judging new music accurately. They had, for the most part, to listen to it without the slightest previous knowledge of it, and to express an opinion upon it probably after one hearing of the work. In these days we can generally study the score of the work long before we hear it. To talk of hearing "Elektra" for the first time on Saturday last is nonsensical. The vocal score has been at our service for twelve months or more, and it was open to any critic to have it by heart before he went into Covent Garden on Saturday. A piano arrangement, it is true, does not tell us all about a complex modern work; but it tells us a great deal, and with that knowledge we can listen to a first performance on the stage in a better state of preparation than the Wagnerian critics could do at a tenth performance. All this critical timidity, then, is not very creditable. Anyone who had taken the trouble to study the score of "Elektra" could easily gather from Saturday's performance whether the parts he had marked out as requiring elucidation sounded as bad as he had expected them to do, or better. And, after the performance, he should be quite able to relieve posterity of the trouble of making up his mind for him on nine points out of ten. Anyhow, it would be better to make the attempt.

All but the Strauss fanatics will admit that, though he is undoubtedly the greatest living musician, there is a strong strain of foolishness and ugliness in him, that he is lacking in the sensitive feeling for the balance of a large work that some other great artists have, and that consequently there is not one large work of his, from "Don Quixote" onward, that is not marred by some folly or some foolery. If it were not for this strain of coarseness and thoughtlessness in him, he would never have taken up so crude a perversion of the old Greek story as that of Hugo von Hofmannsthal. One does not in the least object to a modern poet looking at ancient figures through modern eyes, so long as he can see them convincingly and make them live for us. But to make a play a study of human madness, and then to lay such excessive stress upon the merely physical concomitants of madness, is to ask us to tune our notions of dramatic terror and horror down to too low a pitch. Strauss, of course, revels in this physical, and therefore more superficial, side of the madness, with the result that, instead of impressing us, he generally either bores us or amuses us. We have only to look at a pathological study of human morbidity such as Dostoevsky gives us in "Crime and Punishment," so fine, so unobtrusively true to life, and then listen to the vulgar din by which Strauss tries to convey to us that a woman's brain is distraught, to realise the difference between a man of genius and one who, for the moment, has become merely a man of talent. For the real complaint against the excited music in "Elektra" is that it mostly does not excite you at all; you are rather sorry, in fact, that the composer should take so much trouble to be a failure. For he is so violent that, as a rule, you cannot believe in the least in his violence. He has the besetting Teutonic sin of over-statement, of being unable to see that the half is often greater than the whole; and all this blacking of his face, and waving of his arms, and howling "bolly-golly-black-man—boo!" at us leaves us quite unmoved, except to smile and wish he wouldn't do it. One could easily name a hundred passages in ancient and modern music that thrill us far more horribly, and with far simpler means, than all the clatter that breaks out when Orestes, for example, is murdering Aegistheus. The mere recollection of the stories of ghosts in the churchyard, or of his own fears when, as a child, he was left alone in a dark room, might have told Strauss that horror and the creeping of the flesh are not necessarily associated with noise and fury. His orchestra doth protest too much.

Nor do we need to wait for posterity to tell us that much of the music is as abominably ugly as it is noisy. Here a good deal of the talk about complexity is wide of the mark. The real term for it is incoherence, discontinuity of thinking. "The three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles" sounds absurdly simple, but really represents a good deal of complex cerebral working; so does the G minor fugue of Bach. But "the man in the moon is the daughter of Aunt Martha's tom-cat," though it sounds very complex, is incoherent nonsense; and so is a good deal of "Elektra." Unfortunately, while we have obvious ways of testing the sense or nonsense of the remark about the man in the moon, it is not so easy to test the sense or nonsense of a passage of music; and so a good deal of quite confused thinking gets the credit for being hyper-subtle thinking. What awestruck worshippers call complexity in "Elektra" would often be more correctly described as impudence at its best and incompetence at its worst. As for the more normally lyrical pages in "Elektra," there are very few of them worthy even of a smaller musician than Strauss. The first solo of Chrysothemis, for example, is merely agreeable commonplace; the theme of triumph in the finale is so cheap that it must have been picked up on the rubbish-heap of Italian or French opera. Nothing marks so clearly the degeneration of the musician in Strauss from what he was fifteen years ago than the average melodic writing in "Elektra."

What saves the opera is, first of all, the wonderful beauty of parts of the scene between Elektra and Orestes, especially when, ceasing to be a maniac and becoming a normal woman, she pours out her soul in love for her brother. There is grandeur again—spasmodic, of course, but none the less unescapable—at a hundred points in the score. It may last merely a moment or two, and then flicker off into ugliness or commonplace, but while it is there we are mastered by it. Elektra's cry of "Agamemnon," whenever it occurs, always holds us in this way. Strauss in "Elektra," indeed, is like a huge volcano spluttering forth a vast amount of dirt and murk, through which every now and then, when the fuming ceases and a breath of clear air blows away the smoke, we see the grand and strong original outlines of the mountain. And when Strauss puts forth his whole mental strength, it is indeed overwhelming. We may detest the score as a whole for its violence and frequent ugliness, but the fine things in it are of the kind that no other man, past or present, could have written—the monologue of Elektra just mentioned, for example, or the wailing themes that dominate the section preceding it, or the tense, fateful gloom of the finish of the opera. The result of it all is to give far more pain to Strauss's admirers than it can possibly do to those who have always disliked him. In spite of the pathetic way in which he wastes himself, playing now the fool, now the swashbuckler, now the trickster, you cannot be in doubt that you are listening to a man who is head and shoulders above all other living composers. One still clings to the hope that the future has in store for us a purified Strauss, clothed and in his right mind, who will help us to forget the present Strauss—a saddening mixture of genius, ranter, child, and charlatan. As it is, one would hardly venture to prophesy more than a few short years of life for "Elektra," for the public will not long continue to spend an hour and three-quarters in the theatre for about half an hour's enjoyment.

The Drama.

PENOLOGY AND PYROTECHNY.

"PHOTOGRAPHY" is the blessed word in which those of us who are perturbed and harassed by Mr. Galsworthy's "Justice" are recommended to take refuge. The air was buzzing with it at the Duke of York's on Monday evening, and the buzz was duly prolonged in the morning papers. Quite seriously, I am at a loss to know what these critics want. Would they have people talk blank verse in an attorney's office? Would it please them if Mr. Galsworthy's heroine disguised herself in a wig and gown, appeared at the Old Bailey, and secured the triumphant acquittal of the forger hero? Perhaps I should apologise for treating their complaint in a spirit of burlesque; but, in all good faith, I cannot guess what alternative they would propose to Mr. Galsworthy's "photographic" treatment of the theme he has chosen. The fact seems to be (though they would probably not admit it) that their real complaint is not of the treatment, but of the theme itself. They object ab initio (as the Judge would say) to a subject which must be treated, in a sense, "photographically," on pain of falling into sheer melodrama and convention. It is precisely because Mr. Galsworthy has invented this peculiar art of rendering commonplace fact without crudity, without cynicism, without sentimentalism, without emphasis of any sort, that we value in him one of the most original dramatists, not only of England, but of Europe. If he has a precursor, it is Hauptmann; but there is little doubt that he would have been very much what he is had Hauptmann never existed. And, while the lens of his mind is truer than that of the German master, he is also more faithful to the essence of drama. He can always think scenically, whereas Hauptmann is often apt to forget and overstrain his medium. I am not denying that, till Mr. Galsworthy has given us his "Hannele," he must be reckoned something less than Hauptmann; but, simply as a dramatist, he is also something more. As for the French author whom he most resembles—I mean, of course, Brieux—the finer artistry of the Englishman is surely manifest.

In speaking of the lens of his mind, I may seem to admit the photographic impeachment. Well, let us admit it: let us suppose it just and helpful to say that Mr. Galsworthy goes to work, not with a palette and brushes, but with a camera. If so, what an extraordinary camera it is! A camera that selects the significant, and leaves out the irrelevant and insignificant trait. A camera that seizes upon those moments in a story which, while absorbingly dramatic in the present, throws light most vividly and naturally upon the past. A camera which, though its lens remains absolutely true, steady, and in focus, is yet, by some strange paradox, quivering with indignation, and thrilling with a passion of humanity. A camera—I am sorry if the metaphor is getting into difficulties; it really is not my fault—a camera which, even in its wrath, is just, even in its pity, stern. A camera which, without a note of didactics or of declamation, yet speaks trumpet-tongued against stupidity, callousness, and cant. A camera which might easily be mistaken for a searchlight, and has all the characteristics of a bombshell. Truly a remarkable camera this, and one not commonly quoted in the photographic market.

If one wanted to take what Bunthorne calls "the high æsthetic line" about "Justice," the reproach ought to be, not that the tragedy is photographic, but that it lacks that element of reconciliation, that final outlook into the blue, which the best authorities declare to be indispensable to this form of art. I am afraid it must be admitted that the play does not end in a solemn harmony, or in a vindication of the greatness of man's lot on earth, even in its darker aspects. It is true that the curtain falls on a speech not unlike Horatio's transposed into the key of evangelical sentiment; but I am afraid this is only a final touch of Mr. Galsworthy's irony. No, there is no reconciliation, no consolation in the play, any more than in the first fatal accident in to-day's newspaper. It is, indeed, a fatal accident that we see, protracted over three years. An ordinary, weak, well-meaning youth is passing by a great, slow-grinding machine, when a chance gust of air twitches his coat-tail into the cog-wheels, and he is slowly, remorselessly dragged through the mechanism, to be shot forth, a mangled mass, at the other end. No crank, or rod, or roller in the system is put there with absolutely evil intent. At every turn somebody makes some ineffectual effort to relax or mitigate the crushing process; but the machine moves on majestically, and no human power can control it.

"Good night, sweet prince,
And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest."

Where, then, it may be asked, is the profit or delight of witnessing this cruel, stupid fatality? Is there nothing to take the place of the consolation or elevation which the æstheticians find in great tragedy? Yes, there is—to my mind, a very real and substantial solace. There is no sentimental consolation within the limits of the play, but the play itself—the fact of its existence—is a potent consolation and encouragement. If ever there was a dynamic work of art, it is this. It is not only a fine play, but a good deed—aye, and a strong deed to boot. In spite of all the æstheticians, one doubts whether Hamlet and Othello may not have agonised in vain, so far as the practical advancement of humanity is concerned; but as to poor William Falder, there can be no such doubt. I have said that no human power could control the machine which mangled him; and that is true historically, so to speak—in respect to his individual case. But, fortunately, the mechanism of the law can be controlled by the human will; and "Justice" must invaluablely strengthen the hands of all who seek to modify it in the direction of humanity and enlightenment. The play is a liberal education in rational penology. After having seen James How hesitating whether to prosecute Falder, and then deciding for the worse part, which of us, in a similar event, will not think twice and a third time before telephoning to Scotland Yard? Which of us, having seen the Judge deliberately blind himself, in the name of "morality," to the ethical values of the case, will listen with awe to judicial platitudes which are no more than the creakings of the ruthless machine? I am told that the Judge's speech in passing sentence is criticised as inconceivable. For every phrase of it I will not answer; but in substance I have heard that very allocution inflicted on a hapless prisoner. If only the whole Bench could be taken in a body to see "Justice"! It would be a pity if some of them did not feel a new force in Hamlet's phrase about "guilty creatures sitting at a play." For this trial scene admirably fulfils one of the great functions of art, in that it places the spectator at what may be called a supermundane point of view—the point of view of a higher intelligence. He sees things in their relations and proportions with a clearness which we cannot attain in the actual whirl and welter of life. And if from the spectacle of this law-court, and from the prison scenes which follow, the spectator does not carry away some new realisation of the gaps between law and justice, between justice and humanity, all I can say is that he is either very callous or very dense. Mr. Galsworthy does not even allow him the relief of crying out upon exaggeration. When Charles Reade, in "It's Never Too Late to Mend," placed a scene of prison torture on the stage, a critic rose up in the stalls and protested; and really one could not blame him. It may very well be that the torture itself was not exaggerated; but the whole picture was melodramatically untrue, violent, unacceptable. Mr. Galsworthy, on the other hand, in attacking a system, carefully avoids the logical error of making out that it is administered by monsters. He is studiously fair to all the cranks and levers of the machine. From the Judge downwards, they are fairly well-meaning, not inhuman, not unreasonably stupid people. They are, in fact, just you and me—just what you and I would be in their places. And it is that very fact which makes us feel that it is not those individuals, but you and I and all of us, that are responsible for the inhuman adjustment of the machine. That daring, unforgettable, three-minutes' scene in the solitary cell is, in its very silence, not only eloquent, but—it is the only word—dynamic.

As to the mounting and acting, I need not repeat what fifty other critics have said with one voice. Mr. Eadie, Mr. Gwenn, Mr. Dion Boucicault, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Pateman, Miss Olive—all were as good as they could possibly be. The court scene was the last word of artistic truth in ocular presentment. The mere construction and movement might have been achieved by ordinary diligence and skill, but the lighting showed the touch of a great artist.

When a bare-back rider has "missed his tip" in one round of the ring, he would hold himself eternally disgraced if he did not bring off the feat successfully in the next round. It is evidently this acrobatic point of honor that has inspired Mr. Shaw to follow up "Getting Married" with "Misalliance." In the former play he "missed his tip." In saying this I am not taking any side in Mr. Shaw's quarrel with the critics as to the first-night reception of the piece. I was far away at the time, and know nothing of the matter; but I assume Mr. Shaw's version of it to be correct. In saying that he "missed his tip" I mean that, from observation later in the run of the play, I believe he failed to hold his audiences. The experiment of substituting debate for drama was not, on the whole, successful; and for a man of Mr. Shaw's spirit, there could be no better reason for repeating the experiment and proving that the thing could be done. Well, he has proved his point: he has won the applause which the public is always ready to bestow on the daring performer who is undeterred by Failure No. 1; and, having wiped out the tiny blot in his scutcheon, he will surely feel that honor is satisfied, and that, after a brilliant little excursion into debate, he may safely return to drama. "Misalliance" is probably the most scintillating piece of pure nonsense ever presented to a theatrical audience. Of course, like all Mr. Shaw's nonsense, it abounds in sense, in suggestion, in thought and food for thought. Perhaps nothing he has ever done is so full of memorable and quotable lines. I will go further, and say that John Tarleton, that intellectual Captain Cuttle, is a humorous creation of the first water, admirably played, let me add, by Mr. C. M. Loune. But when all is said and done—or rather when all is said, for nothing, of course, is done—we have simply spent three hours in an immensely diverting lunatic asylum. There criticism begins and ends: for criticism must appeal to reason, and has nothing to do in a sphere where the negation of reason is the very condition of existence. Just by way of record, not of criticism, one may note the punctual reappearance of several of Mr. Shaw's fixed ideas, such as the wrangling family and the betrothal of two people who, an hour before, had never heard of each other. These are mere trade-marks, without which no Shaw play is genuine. One comes away, in sum, sore with laughter, dazzled with a thousand broken lights of thought, full of admiration for the brilliant acting of Miss Miriam Lewes, Miss Lena Ashwell, Mr. O. P. Heggie, and their comrades, and convinced that it must be at least three in the morning instead of barely eleven-twenty.

Letters to the Editor.

A FORGOTTEN ANALOGY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems odd that some of the obvious lessons from the events of 1831-2 are not drawn for the benefit of those who are faced with our present problem.

The first and plainest of these is that the Reform Bill was passed after only one election specifically taken on the question of Reform in 1831, and that the most cogent argument of Sir James Graham, in pressing Lord Grey to insist on guarantees, when he finally did, was that no second election was either necessary or desirable.

And the second, and scarcely less important, is that, as Mr. Asquith has unanswerably argued, guarantees of this nature cannot be got beforehand, but only at the time when they become indispensable after sufficient evidence that the House of Lords will not act reasonably. In the Parliament of 1831-2, the Reform Bill was rejected in 1831, and a second session was taken to pass it, but it was passed into law by the use of the prerogative in this second session and without a second election.

The Parliament of 1830, elected on the death of George IV., was elected during the Duke of Wellington's administration and not specifically on the question of reform. It was to that Parliament that Earl Grey, succeeding the Duke, made his first proposals. But the only Parliament elected on the issue passed the Reform Bill without a further appeal to the people.—Yours, &c.,

THE NEXT STEP IN WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent of February 19th, under the above heading, investigates the numerical ratio of members of the suffrage societies, first, to the women population as a whole, and next, to the million and a half whose enfranchisement would follow upon the passing of a Limited Bill. She finds the ratio, even in the latter case, to be a low one, and therefore concludes that the majority of women to be enfranchised thereby are apathetic upon the subject. Accordingly, she advises the suffrage societies to concentrate activity upon the conversion of women only, to the manifest relief of a "peace-loving electorate," and "an over-burdened Government."

There are grounds for qualifying her statement, and for opposing the accompanying suggestion.

The ratio of membership, in the first place, is not a really accurate test of the interest taken in this movement, nor of the desire for enfranchisement. Numbers of women would join a society if the opposition they expect from their immediate circle did not deter them, and many others have not been approached by any efficient advocate of the reform. That this shows considerable mental inertia and lack of moral courage on the part of these dumb insurgents is true; but movements of reform have always encountered such. The majority invariably accepts and uses to advantage the benefits obtained by a courageous minority. Victories in war are won as a rule by an army, not by a population; and the parallel holds good in politics.

To expend valuable time and effort exclusively upon making women converts would be anything but a next step towards Women's Suffrage. It would be a retrograde movement indeed. What power have women to confer the vote? None whatever, of course. Naturally those in earnest about it endeavor to influence those—the electorate and the Government of the day, namely—who have the power to grant it; and sensibly endeavor to put pressure where their energy will tell most effectively.—Yours, &c.,

(M.A. (Edin.), formerly Fellow of Bryn Mawr College, U.S.A.)

February 20th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Miss Travers asks the militant Suffragists to undertake a campaign for the education of the "serried ranks of dreary, idle, indifferent women." What newspapers does she read? Does she not know that it is useless to consult the daily Press for any news of the women's movement when it is of a peaceful nature? If she wishes to learn what the militant women are doing, she should read their organ, "Votes for Women," and she would then know (1) that they have been doing for years the very thing she asks for; (2) that they have now undertaken, on an enormous scale, a fresh educational campaign, called "The Mission to Women," which was inaugurated by the W.S.P.U. simultaneously with their temporary suspension of militant tactics.

Nearly three pages of this week's "Votes for Women" are devoted to reports of the Mission from all parts, and on p. 328 Miss Travers will find a list of no less than 70 such meetings for London alone, from February 18th to the 26th.

Under the circumstances her advice, though very good, is surely a little belated.—Yours, &c.,

WINIFRED HOLIDAY.

Oak Tree House, Branch Hill, Hampstead, N.W.

February 21st, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Your correspondent, Miss Travers, has been calculating the number of women supporters of the suffrage on the basis of the membership of the suffrage societies. I should like to remind her that practically every other association of women makes a strong demand for the vote. The Women's Liberal Associations, Co-operative Guilds, Trades Unions, Labor Leagues, &c., number hundreds of thousands of members, and pass resolution after resolution on the subject with unanimity.

Also, I think that it is in the experience of most active workers for the suffrage that for every woman Suffragist who joins a society there are great numbers who for various reasons do not make such a definite profession of faith. Many are poor, and cannot afford even a shilling subscription; some do not realise the necessity for combination, or are afraid to come forward, or of being chaffed. Others, I know, being occupied in other ways, fear that they will be called upon to do active work.

And very many, indeed, are afraid of their men folk. This may sound absurd, but it is a fact. Naturally, the home ideal of most women is still self-sacrifice and peace-at-any-price. They do not yet realise that the "womanly" virtues, carried to excess at the expense of dignity, conscience, and individuality, may degrade, and not exalt, the home life. Meanwhile, the agitation is carried on by a more fortunate, or more courageous, minority.—Yours, &c.,

SUFFRAGIST.

February 23rd, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Miss Rosalind Travers argues that because the principal suffrage societies have, between them, a membership of only 35,000, the rest of qualified women are indifferent. Could anything be more fallacious? What political league of men or women on any other subject can show larger membership or greater enthusiasm? Could any of them—with all their free advertisement in the Press—fill such halls as the Albert and Queen's Halls dozens of times every year, hold thousands of successful meetings throughout the whole country, raise £100,000 in a year, and find 500 of its members willing to suffer prison torture for the sake of their unselfish cause? Thousands of true Liberals voted against the Government which cast into prison Cobden's daughter, and other noble British women, and treated them as criminals while there. Mr. Philip Snowden truly and wisely warned the Government that its downfall was more probable through its treatment of the women's question than for any other cause. The "Next Step" should be the prompt and simple removal of the sex disability. Not only would it be a simple act of justice ; it would bring to the aid of the Liberal Government one of the finest and most enthusiastic organisations of modern times.—Yours, &c.,

W. R. SNOW.

3, Buckingham Gate, S.W.

February 20th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter of Miss Travers in your last issue seems, as far as I can succeed in analysing it, to contain two main points: (1) That judging from the membership of the various suffrage societies, the proportion of women desiring the Parliamentary vote is small; (2) That "the next step in women's suffrage ought to be a campaign, not against the peace-loving electorate or the overburdened Government, but against the serried ranks of dreary, idle, indifferent women."

In regard to the first point, I beg to repeat, with emphasis, the truth which certain politicians are so anxious to have forgotten, the truth that no extension of the franchise has ever yet depended upon, or resulted from, its being demanded by a majority of the unenfranchised. The attempt to require such a demand in the case of women is one of those many instances of a differential treatment of women which make it so necessary that we should speak for ourselves through the medium of the vote. This being so, it is only needful to touch lightly upon Miss Travers's figures. On the basis of my statement that the London Society has for over a year been adding members at the rate of 100 per month, she estimates the total increase of the National Union of Suffrage Societies, in three months, at 500. Now the National Union is a federation of over a hundred societies, of which the London society is one. If the London society, alone, adds 300 members in three months, is it credible that the other 105 or so societies (including the very large Manchester society) add but 200? Even allowing an average of but ten new members monthly to each society, the figure for three months would exceed 3,000.

As to the second point, it must be observed: First, that all the suffrage societies do endeavor, and have always endeavored, to make converts among their fellow-women, and, in fact (as the London figures show), do actually make converts in increasing numbers. Naturally, however, the "serried ranks of dreary, idle, indifferent women" offer us the very worst field. Can it possibly be for this reason that Miss Travers would have us cultivate it exclusively? Second, that since women cannot give us the vote, while electorates and governments can, we should be fools indeed if we directed our energies solely to the conversion of women. That is why, during the recent elections, hundreds of women stood in rain, in wind, in mud, outside polling-booths, collecting the signatures of electors to petitions in support of our demands. The total of thousands of signatures collected throughout the country I do not yet know; but I do know that the petition forwarded to-day to the member for this constituency contained over 1,200 signatures, and that, in a neighboring constituency, the total of electors who signed verged upon 3,000. In the "serried ranks" of the electorate, not in those of "the faithful votaries of amusement," we look for our effective supporters.—Yours, &c.,

THE LIBERAL PRESS IN SCOTLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be permitted to suggest that your correspondents on this subject overlook the main factor in the establishment of a strong and authoritative penny Liberal paper in Scotland? If they recall the last attempt that was made to this end, I think they will agree with me that if ever a paper deserved to succeed it was the "Scottish Leader." It collapsed in the early 'nineties—why? Simply, if not solely, owing to the absence of support by Liberal advertisers. Not only Liberal advertisers, but, I am told, Liberal members of Parliament for Scotland, are far too ready to patronise, and be patronised by, the Tory papers. Little as the latter affect their political opinions, they show a partiality towards the Tory organs which is the strangest reflection imaginable upon their sense of logic, not to say independence. It is no use for Scottish Liberals to cry out for a really good Liberal paper, unless they recognise that the matter is in their own hands—that the desired organ in the Edinburgh-Glasgow portion of Scotland is only possible of achievement if they are prepared to support it right up to the hilt.

"Anti-Monopolist" began this discussion by asking for an enterprising journalist. Surely he meant, in the first place, an enterprising capitalist—or two. The Liberal Government is notoriously neglectful of its Press, even to the extent of bestowing its inspiration upon a Tory paper in London, while allowing a Liberal one to die. But the Liberal cause is always greater than any Liberal Government, in Scotland or elsewhere, and Scottish private enterprise should be equal to making a Liberal paper, instead of a Tory one, the dominating voice in Scotland. Perhaps neither the Liberal advertisers nor the Liberal M.P.'s will be roused from indifference until reverses come thick and fast upon the party in Scotland. Meantime the laugh is on the side of the Tory papers which are making an exceedingly comfortable living by aid of the Liberals whom they so generously snub.—Yours, &c.,

SCOTTISH LIBERAL.

London, February 21st, 1910.

P.S.—The most interesting contribution to the question could come (an' they would!) from the Scottish Unionist candidates in the shape of a candid opinion upon what the great "Scotsman" and "Glasgow Herald" hath profited them against the Liberal organs. I gladly—as all Scottish Liberals do—acknowledge the glorious deeds of the Liberal Press as it exists: the "Dundee Advertiser," the "People's Journal," the "Edinburgh Evening News," and the rest.

RECENT ELECTIONS AND THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR.—The letter of your correspondent, "A Country Liberal," of February 12th, is extraordinarily true. The weakness of the Government in not tackling their own Small Holdings Act is probably accountable for the loss of hundreds of laborers' votes. The Act was allowed to remain one of the many "paper Acts," drafted to soothe the radical conscience of the townsman, and not put into force owing to the passive resistance of the powers that be in the country.

May I give an example of what happened in my county? For a year or more a little group of landless laborers had been trying in this village to get the Act put into force, and succeeded so far as to get a Government inquiry held. They had the Parish Council, the District Council, and the County Council against them. The inquiry, however, was conducted fairly and impartially, and it brought out the fact that the land was indubitably needed by the laborers. It was suggested, however, that private treaty was better than compulsion, and that settled the matter as far as the laborers were concerned. The question was referred back to the County Council, and there it remains.

The landlord's agent had opposed the acquisition of the land at the inquiry, and as he and I were discussing the question after the meeting was over, a splendid individual, who had arrived specially in a motor-car, joined us. He apologised for intruding and said he was a special commissioner for small holdings who was watching the case. "And I gather," said he, "that you regard this agitation as purely fictitious?" "Purely!" said the agent, and the special commissioner drove away in his car, his work apparently having been done. In the same way the Government seemed to think their work done after the passing of the Act. Not so the laborer.

The Liberal member for the district, who saw the inwardness of the situation, tried unsuccessfully to get a question asked in the House of Commons, and he was subsequently unseated, largely by a turning of the laborers' vote.—Yours, &c.,

A PHILOSOPHIC ONLOOKER.

February 23rd, 1910.

THE LATE MR. PETE CURRAN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Something more is due to the memory of the late Pete Curran than the scanty paragraphs in the Press announcing the death and funeral of a labor leader.

Curran's leadership in the labor movement was, of itself, remarkable. Take the Gas Workers' and General Laborers' Union, which Curran served for twenty years as chief organiser. In the enthusiasm for the new unionism a number of trade unions for laborers were formed in the 'eighties, and one or two of these still linger on; but the Gas Workers' Union alone has strength and vitality as a national organisation. From the first its leaders saw the importance of political action, with the result that, from 1906 to 1910, this general union of laborers sent three members to Parliament, Mr. Will Thorne, Mr. J. R. Clynes, and Pete Curran. Curran himself fought no less than five Parliamentary contests in fifteen years. No other trade union outside the miners' organisation can show more effective work in politics than the Gas Workers.

Two things deserve to be recalled (or, at least, stand out clear to me above the rest) in those twenty years of labor leadership. (1) Curran's willingness to face imprisonment for the men he served. In 1890 he received six weeks' imprisonment for "intimidation" at Plymouth; the conviction was quashed on appeal by Chief Justice Coleridge, but Curran would have done the time without complaining. (2) Curran's insistence that what was good for the mechanic was good for the unskilled laborer. At the Trade Union Congress (1898?) Curran carried the delegates with him in his demand for an eight hours' day for the laborer.

The twenty years of agitation and organisation were nearly spent when the last General Election came, and these years had left their mark on Curran. A year ago he needed—for him, the impossible—complete rest. Curran went into the late Election a dying man. He knew that he was dying—doctors warned him that if he won he would not live to take his seat. And yet, night after night, he dragged himself out to speak, resolute to keep his end up, to fight on to the very last breath.

"If you choose to play!—
Let a man contend to the uttermost,
For his life's set prize, be it what it will."

It was this heroic contending to the uttermost in the face of death that makes Curran's dying a finer thing even than his twenty years' service.—Yours, &c.,

THE SECRECY OF THE BALLOT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent "J. R." is perfectly correct in his recollection of the Ballot Act, but the provision to which he refers does not effectively preclude a general knowledge being gained of the way in which a given district has voted.

Rule 34, in the first schedule attached to the Act, provides that "Before the Returning Officer proceeds to count the votes he shall, in the presence of the agents of the candidates, open each ballot-box, and, taking out the papers therein, shall count and record the number thereof," and then mix all the papers together before counting the votes. "While counting the number of ballot papers and counting the votes, he shall keep the ballot papers with their faces upwards, and take all proper precautions for preventing any person from seeing the numbers printed on the backs of such papers."

It is thus easy for the agent, who is looking on while the number of the papers in a particular box is being counted, to reckon up in his head the number of votes for and against, as the papers are being unfolded one by one and laid face upwards before his eyes, and thus to obtain a fairly close knowledge of the way a particular village or polling district has gone. It is difficult to prevent it being known which box is which. In fact, often the number of papers it contains would be sufficient indication.

The object of the above regulations is, of course, plain. On the back of the paper is the official progressive number corresponding with that on the counterfoil, which might in some cases identify the voter. The presiding officer in the booth, at any rate, has the means of knowing to whom he gave any particular paper. Moreover, if I go to vote, and Smith comes in just after me and gets the next paper, I can tell the number of his from that of mine. Other instances could easily be imagined.

Such cases, however, would necessarily be few, while the virtual infringement of the ballot which occurs under the present system is serious, especially, no doubt, in country districts. Even in towns, it is possible, say, for a large employer or property owner, whose workmen or tenants live mainly in a single polling district, to ascertain with some accuracy whether they have regarded or ignored his advice or his orders.

For myself, I do not see why the rule should not be that during the counting of the papers the backs only should be looked at, but during the counting of the votes only the faces, provided, as is always done in practice, the papers are effectually mixed between the two operations. It conveys no useful information to see the official number on the back of a ballot paper, unless you can also, then or later, see the vote on the front of a paper that you know to be the same. I have, in fact, known returning officers at municipal elections, with the idea that they were carrying out the policy of the Act, insist on the papers being kept face downwards during the counting of their number.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At the counting of the votes at the election for the County of Brecknock, the candidates' scrutineers were not allowed to overlook the papers during the time the boxes were being verified by the ballot paper account. With the sanction of the Sheriff I had made an arrangement with the Tory Election Agent beforehand, on this matter. It was most fortunate and reassuring to our people in the rural parts.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

SOME OLD CHINESE SONGS.

Rendered into English by David Wilson.

I.

THE ROYAL ROAD IS RIGHTEOUSNESS.

(The "Shu King" is the most ancient collection of Chinese writings, and the "Great Plan" in Part V., Book IV., of it is assigned by some to the time of King Yao. If not belonging to the third millenium B.C., it is at least one of the oldest fragments of the "Shu King." And the unknown writer of the "Great Plan" quotes with approval a bit of poetry by a poet also covered by the oblivion that awaits us all.)

THE Royal Road is Righteousness.
It's straight, without unevenness:
And private love, and private hate,
It leaves aside, by going straight,
On every side it gives a view,
For ever clear, for ever true:
And broad and easy 'tis to know,
For him who has the heart to go.
The Royal Road shall never bend.
The Royal Road shall never end.

THE PRINCELY ROADS TO RUIN.

("Shu King," III., III., 2. Assigned to the third millenium B.C.)

(Air.—"The Flowers of the Forest.")

I.

I've seen the smiling of plenty beguiling;
I've seen the follies make princes decay:
Single's the bright road, the only one right road;
O, but to ruin, there's many a way!

II.

Game let them cherish; the other things perish;
Waste is the land and the princes decay.
Vice let them treasure; in palace hunt pleasure;
Certain to ruin them, that is a way.

III.

Oh how entrancing is damned necromancing!
Seeking the spirits the princes decay.
Fluting and fiddling, delightful diddiddling:
Ruin they reach in a musical way.

IV.

Carving and building, and painting and gilding;
These are diseases make princes decay.
Single's the bright road, the only one right road:
O, but to ruin there's many a way!

See "The Royal Road to Righteousness." But, perhaps, the best commentary on this beautiful song is a remark in a preceding chapter: "Shu King," II., II., 2:—

"The mind of man is restless and prone to err, with small affinity to what is right. Be watchful and steady, so as to hold fast to what is righteous and moderate, avoiding foolish extremes."

III.

THE SONG OF THE HAPPY LOVER.

(Odes.—Tcheng-Ki-Tong, in his excellent book, of which a translation has been published under the title, "The Chinese: Painted by Themselves," by the Leadenhall Press, gives prose translations of various pieces in the odes, ending with this one, and adds: "Why can I not translate the harmony of our lines?" This may be sung to the sweet old Irish tune, "The Rose of Tralee.")

THE long rampart's shadow grows longer and longer;
'Twas here and 'twas now that she promised to be;
I'm held here by love, that grows stronger and stronger;
I'm restless, but patient—she's coming to me!
Behold ye the fire-colored stone on my finger?
It warms and it comforts me, feeling like fire.
'Twas she gave it me, for whom here I do linger,—
My darling, whose presence is all I desire!

Saw ye ever a flower like this rose so excelling?
So fragrant, so dainty, so perfect of hue?
There's something about it that's better worth telling—
I got it from her, I am telling you true!
You'll see, when she comes, how complete is her beauty;
For that's a detail that a stranger can see;
But O! she's so good, and so perfect in duty!—
I'm restless but patient—she's coming to me!

THE SONG OF THE SORROWING WIFE.

(Odes.—This is to the air of "Ye Banks and Braes O' Bonnie Doon." It is assigned to the good and beautiful, but neglected, Kwang Kiang, the wife of "duke Kwang of Wei," about the middle of the eighth century B.C.)

I.

O Sun and Moon, that light the skies,
And shine upon the earth below,
See ye what's hid from other eyes?
See ye a weary woman's woe?
He wanders lawless where he will;
Yet never is from misery free;
O, how can he his spirit still?
And will he then remember me?

II.

O Sun and Moon that light the skies,
And leave in shade the earth below,
See ye what's hid from other eyes?
See ye a weary woman's woe?
For good he's aye returning ill,
Like one that only foes can see,—
O, how can he his spirit still?
And will he then remember me?

III.

O, Sun and Moon that climb the skies,
And shine upon the earth below,
See ye what's hid from other eyes?
See ye a weary woman's woe?
A wicked man, whose only skill
Is now a hypocrite to be,—
O, how can he his spirit still?
Or will he then remember me?

IV.

O, Sun and Moon that climb the skies,
And shine upon the earth below,
See ye what's hid from other eyes?
See ye a weary woman's woe?
Ye make me think of childhood's plays,
Ere ever I had learned to mourn;
My father's and my mother's days,
Departed, never to return!

V.

THE CHINESE AULD LANG SYNE.

(Odes.—This may be sung to the air of "Auld Lang Syne.")

I.

UPON the trees we cut, "Kang, kang."
The birds reply "Ying, ying."
Up from the shady glen, one sprang,
Away upon the wing.
See where it sits on tree above,
In loneliness distressed.
As life is empty, lacking love,
It whistles for the rest.

II.

Since little birds each other hail,
Shall men not do the same?
Need we not friends to hear our tale,
And give our feelings name?
In harmony when all is said,
So we'll at peace remain;
And so shall friends, who long are dead,
In spirit smile again.

THE HAPPY FARMER.

(Air.—"The Miller of Dee," or any similar air.)

(This is a traditional song, whereof two things can be said, that it is of great antiquity, and that the spirit of it is alive to-day. See Legge's Odes, appendix to preface, giving old songs not in the classic.)

FROM morning sun,
Till day is done,
I'm working on the ground;
And working hard,
Have fit reward,
For food and drink abound.

With food and drink,
I'm free to think,
And heed not powers that be.
O, what care I
If a king go by?
It's all the same to me!

MR. MICHAEL MACDONAGH, who is the author of "A Book of Parliament" and of several political biographies, is at present engaged upon a book dealing with the Speakers of the House of Commons, which will be published by Messrs. Methuen. The subject is both fresh and interesting, and, considering the popularity of Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors," it is surprising that no work treating of the Speakers on similar lines has as yet been written.

* * *

THE subject chosen by Mr. Rackham for his next color book is Wagner's "Ring." It will be issued in the autumn by Mr. Heinemann.

* * *

It is safe to say that, with the possible exception of "Sandford and Merton," no book was more likely to be found in the nurseries of the early and middle Victorian period than Mrs. Sherwood's "History of the Fairchild Family." It first appeared in 1818 and still retains some favor from young readers, at least if we may judge from the well-thumbed copies to be picked up from second-hand booksellers, or from rather garbled editions which the publishers still issue. A "Life of Mrs. Sherwood," largely based upon her autobiography, was published by her daughter, Sophia Kelly, in 1854. But Mrs. Sherwood's diaries run to more than half a million words, and, together with Captain Henry Sherwood's journals, contain materials which are employed in "The Life and Times of Mrs. Sherwood," by Mr. F. J. Harvey Darton, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co. It gives an account of the Lichfield of Dr. Johnson, Miss Seward, and the Edgeworths, describes Dr. Valpy's settlement at Reading for French refugees, and gives a picture of India in the days of the Nabobs and of Henry Martyn. It also furnishes glimpses of Erasmus Darwin, Hannah More, Scott, Elizabeth Fry, and others of distinction in the period. But the main interest of the book is that it brings before us an intimate picture of a class, moderate in its standards of wealth and cultivation, but earnest in social and religious endeavor, which has largely escaped the notice of memoir-writers and historians.

* * *

MR. FISHER UNWIN is about to issue "The Court Series of French Memoirs," chiefly made up of works that have not hitherto been translated into English. The first to appear will be "The Royal Family in the Temple Prison," a translation of the journal kept by Cléry, Louis XVI.'s valet, which contains a detailed account of the life of the royal family from August, 1792, when the mob attacked the Tuileries, to the morning of the King's death, January 21st, 1793. Other volumes in the series are Duclos' "Secret Memoirs of the Regency," Lauzun's "Memoirs," and the "Memoirs Relating to Fouché."

A WELCOME addition to the world of books will be Lord Crewe's biography of his father, which will, presumably, contain material inaccessible to Sir Wemyss Reid when he wrote the official "Life."

* * *

MESSRS. MACMILLAN are about to issue a new edition of Pater's works, in ten volumes, the first of which, "The Renaissance," will appear in April next and the remainder in monthly volumes throughout the year. The price will be at the uniform rate of seven and sixpence net per volume.

* * *

MR. CECIL CHESTERTON has just finished a book on the political situation, which will be published by Messrs. Alston Rivers under the title of "Party and People." The view taken is that the last election is a sign of the break-up of the party system, and that the political division of the future will be on geographical rather than on party lines. Mr. Chesterton pleads for a democratic programme, and urges that at present the real issues are never brought before the people. There is a discussion of the tariff question, on lines not likely to meet with the approval of either Protectionists or Free Traders.

* * *

A LARGE number of unpublished letters of Flaubert will be contained in the volume of his "Correspondance" shortly to appear in the edition of his complete works which M. Louis Conrad is now issuing.

* * *

AMONG the announcements of the Oxford University Press is "A History of English Versification," by Hofrat J. von Schipper. English metre and prosody have been studied more carefully by Continental scholars than among ourselves. There are several German treatises upon the subject, and quite recently M. Lucien Wolff's careful examination of Keats's treatment of the heroic rhythm and blank verse was published by Messrs. Hachette. The chief English books upon versification are Mr. Mayor's "Chapters on English Metre," Professor Saintsbury's "History of English Prosody," the concluding volume of which will be issued shortly by Messrs. Macmillan, and Mr. Robert Bridges's book on Milton's prosody.

* * *

THE discovery at Zurich of "Wilhelm Meister's Theatralische Sendung," the lost version of Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre," has aroused an interest rather in excess of its importance. German authorities regard the document as genuine and believe it can be traced to Barbara Schulthess who is known to have received several manuscripts from Goethe. It differs largely from the printed text, and for that reason will almost certainly be printed.

* * *

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a memoir of the first Earl of Cranbrook, with extracts from his diary and correspondence, by his son, Mr. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy. Lord Cranbrook defeated Mr. Gladstone for the representation of Oxford University in 1878, and shortly afterwards became a member of Lord Derby's Ministry. The memoir will contain letters written by Disraeli, Lord Derby, the Earl of Iddesleigh, and other leading statesmen of the time.

* * *

MESSRS. EYRE AND SPOTTISWOODE are bringing out in fortnightly parts a history of Japan from the year 1868 to the present time, by Mr. George Lynch. The title of the work is "Old and New Japan: The Romantic Story of a Romantic People," and contributions from several Japanese statesmen and artists will be included.

* * *

"ETON UNDER HORNBY" is the title of a book of reminiscences by an Old Etonian which Mr. Fifield has almost ready for publication. It contains a chapter on William Cory, the author of "Ionica," and an abundance of anecdotes current in the school during Dr. Hornby's headmastership.

* * *

THE English translation of Professor Bergson's "Time and Free Will: An Essay on the Immediate Data of Consciousness," by Mr. F. L. Pogson, which has been held over from last season, will be published shortly by Messrs. Sonnenschein.

RELIGION WITHOUT METAPHYSICS.*

It is a nice question whether the famous phrase, "religion without enthusiasm," be not a contradiction in terms. To this brilliant yet laborious book by M. Reinach another motto equally disputable might be applied. It is a study of religion without metaphysics. One by one the faiths and superstitions of mankind pass under the review of this clever and sceptical Jew, much as a professor of comparative anatomy may handle his skeletons, prehistoric and historic, in a museum. He reconstructs the primitive crawling shapes of totemism and animism. He shows in the most evolved and universal religions of civilisation the atrophied organ, the rudimentary tail which betrays their origin from these earlier types. He recounts the futile and cruel history of persecutions and religious wars, much as a zoologist may explain how the brown rat replaced the black. But as one listens to the daring, yet convincing, demonstration, half-hypnotised by the success of its affiliations and genealogies, one manages none the less to gasp out an irrelevant old-fashioned question. What after all of God? For religions are, when all is said, an attempt to reach some sort of synthesis of thought, some kind of intelligible explanation of the universe. They are metaphysics, informed, or, if you will, obscured by emotion. They are something more than an attempt to systematise myth and custom. M. Reinach's attitude is, we gather, perfectly conscious and deliberate. He starts by defining religion as "a sum of scruples which impede the free exercise of our faculties." That definition, valuable and illuminating as it is, seems to us to illustrate the besetting fallacy of the purely historical method. A better summary of early religions and superstitions one could hardly find. It includes the necessary idea of taboo, and all that may be evolved from it. It is perfectly clear that the most developed religion sprang from these origins, and never succeeded in shaking itself wholly free from them. But it is a wanton begging of the whole question to assume that the phrase which defines the egg will fully render the developed organism. M. Reinach has written an essay, not so much upon religion, as on certain continuous and persistent elements in religion. But the thing which is at the start a germ, ends by becoming a mere survival. There is probably much more truth to be got by this method, fairly and objectively pursued, than by the metaphysical analysis of the people who have written "philosophies of religion." But it is none the less a very partial truth.

It is as important as it is interesting to trace in later varieties of religion the influence of totem and taboo. It is, for example, as startling as it is probable to discover that Christian fasts may be traced, not so much to any ascetic notions of abstaining from food or mortifying the flesh, as to the worship of some fish totem, which had to be eaten ritually once a week. But this antiquarian lore is as far as possible from telling us the essential truth about Christian fasts. Mankind, starting with an equipment of superstitions, some of them stupid and childish, others disgusting or cruel, and a few capable of serving some social use or of wearing some intelligible meaning, has selected those which served its ultimate needs. There has been a struggle for existence among scruples, and it is a question whether we ought not to seek the essence of religion rather in this process of selection than in the scruples themselves. One may trace the root-idea of sacrifice, the killing of the god and the eating of his flesh, in the various Oriental cults which competed for the faith of the decadent Græco-Roman world, to an obscure memory of totemism. But the success of one among these cults was due to the fact that it presented this root idea, this world-old survival, in a certain moral context. The important fact for a history of religions is rather to expose these newer elements which caused one religion to give place to another, than to trace the obscure, primitive basis, which is common to them all. M. Reinach has done valuable pioneer work in this necessary task of detecting relics of totemism, and in going back to the original taboo. But this over-mastering pre-occupation of his has gone far to destroy the balance of his survey.

To insist on this fundamental defect in "Orpheus" is not, however, to belittle its value as a book. It has, in the first place, the mingled grace and accuracy of modern French scientific writing, admirably rendered, one must add, by his translator. There is no straining for effect. The exposition is, above all things, lucid, full, and accurate. But the alert and very human mind of the writer never sinks under the weight of his summaries. At the end of two or three pages of painstaking history or analysis, one is constantly refreshed by some incisive epigram, some witty flash of criticism. The best chapters in the book are, to our thinking, those which deal with origins—with savage religion, with the eloquent traces of totemism in Greek mythology, or with the early evolution of Christianity and its connection with contemporary Oriental cults. But the scope of the book goes far beyond this. Nearly one-half of it is devoted to the history of Christianity, from the first century down to the latest phase of Modernism. M. Reinach writes from a fortunately objective standpoint—that of a good and patriotic Jew, who is at once a Liberal, a humanitarian, and an agnostic. His summary of the results of New Testament criticism is, of course, necessarily, but by no means recklessly, destructive. He dismisses the wilder speculations as to the dates of the early Christian documents with an abrupt contempt, and reaches a conclusion as to their origins, authenticity, and historic value which hardly differs from that of the Abbé Loisy. His standpoint in narrating the wars of rival sects and the persecutions which have made so much of Christian history is, on the whole, that of a disinterested humanitarian, who judges fairly between rivals, with a certain perception of the fact that the Church, when she persecuted, was rarely, if ever, concerned with dogma or faith, but sought only to assert her authority or enforce her discipline. Once or twice, it may be, his ardent sympathy with the oppressed rather destroys the balance of his survey. The history of the Waldenses, for example, is traced at some length, in order that the Church may bear the full responsibility for her crimes. But the gentler and more beautiful manifestations of Catholicism, such as the teaching of St. Francis or the preaching of Savonarola, win from M. Reinach little more than a passing notice, fair, so far as it goes, but by no means adequate. He is, as one might expect, violently, but not, we think, blindly anti-Jesuit. His treatment of Protestantism and Protestant sects is open to the same criticism which weighs upon the whole book. He insists, as well as one could desire, on the historical and political importance of Protestantism as a reaction against Rome. But it does not seem to occur to him that Protestantism is in any sense an attempt to explain life or to reach a theory of God. Even those phases of it which do so obviously display original thinking, Quakerism for example, are discussed in a spirit which is kindly, accurate, and fair, yet altogether external. Catholic Modernism is welcomed and emphasised as a revolt against obscurantism, which may have immense political importance. But we find no mention of Leo Tolstoy, whose attempt to restore primitive Christianity as it ought to have been, if not perhaps as it was, is surely even more worthy of notice as speculation, and at least as important as a contemporary social influence. The most serious deficiency in the book is, however, its slight treatment of Islam. We are not disposed to quarrel with M. Reinach's contemptuous estimate of the Koran. It wanted some courage, in the face of the specialists, always ready to exalt a study to which they have given laborious years, to speak the plain truth about its poverty, whether as literature or speculation. Islam is not interesting as theology, nor does it furnish a rich field for the investigation of the primitive survivals which specially interest M. Reinach. But its conservation is one of the most interesting problems in religious history, its future its most portentous mystery, and its moral influence a fact which deserved some analysis. M. Reinach perhaps hardly realises to what extent the various dervish orders (which he hardly mentions) supplement the theological bareness and austerity of orthodox Islam.

It is inevitable that in a book dealing with the most controversial of human interests, one should find much to criticise. But "Orpheus" remains to our thinking a masterpiece in its own line, and a book destined to exert a great popular influence among educated laymen. No other work even claims to attempt the task which it discharges so adequately, and we doubt whether it would be possible to find elsewhere a summary so convenient and so careful of the latest researches of scholarship even in the obscure regions of Celtic and Germanic religion. "Orpheus" was written, we gather, mainly with a practical end—to liberate the mind from superstition and fear, and at the same time to protest against the crudities of the old Voltairian tradition which was apt to dismiss religion as priestcraft. It intervenes between French clericalism and French Atheism with a calm and objective interpretation of history in the light of evolution. Such an intervention must make in France for charity. In this country it is possible that in the ears of the average reader, M. Reinach's eirenicon may have a ring of provocation.

THE CONSERVATIVE AS CRITIC OF POETRY.*

THE completion of Dr. Courthope's "History of English Poetry" is a notable achievement and entitles its author to the congratulations of every student of our literature. It is a work of high ambition, planned upon broad lines, and possessing all the authority that goes with thorough scholarship, clear and sober thinking, and the rigid application of definite theories of criticism. Its purpose, as Dr. Courthope stated in the preface to the first volume, and as he reminds us in the concluding chapter of the last, has been "to treat poetry as an expression of the imagination, not simply of the individual poet, but of the English people; to use the facts of political and social history as keys to the poet's meaning, and to make poetry clothe with life and character the dry record of external facts." Dr. Courthope never loses sight of this purpose. He is fully alive to the fact that poetry is an art, but he never misses an opportunity of declaring that it is a social art, and he is so anxious to keep before his readers the political and social groundwork out of which poetry springs, that he begins the present volume by a chapter on the fall of the Holy Roman Empire and ends it with a reference to the last General Election.

Dr. Courthope's theory of poetry, which runs counter to most contemporary criticism, though in part welcome as a corrective, is in part also an attempt to get back to the eighteenth century and to close up avenues that are now open. He is right in insisting that poetry must not be dissociated from life, but he seems not to recognise sufficiently that, as Professor Bradley puts it in his "Oxford Lectures on Poetry," the bond uniting them is a connection underground. "The two may be called different forms of the same thing: one of them having (in the usual sense) reality, but seldom satisfying the imagination; while the other offers something that satisfies imagination but has not full 'reality.'" The reader of Dr. Courthope's work is more than once led to the conclusion that, if its author does not go to the extreme length of treating poetry as an aspect of politics, he certainly looks for the explanation of poetry in the outward circumstances and current ideas of the poet's time.

This method of regarding the poet as subordinate to his environment was seen to best advantage in Dr. Courthope's account of Pope and the literature of the Queen Anne period—a period when the poet thought it his proper function to give polished expression to ideas which were the common property of most educated men. It also inspires some excellent chapters in the present volume on the exhaustion of the classical influence, the New Whigs and their influence on criticism and poetry, and anti-Jacobinism in English poetry. What Dr. Courthope has to say upon the alliance between the Whig statesmen and the Whig men of letters, and of the evolution of sentiment and style in English literature, corresponding to the evolution of political parties that succeeded the Revolution, is full of interest, though he presses the analogy between political and literary development a little too far. But, in the main section of the book, which treats of the effect of the French Revolution, and of the Romantic movement, the principle is applied in a way that leads to startling results. Here Dr. Courthope's principles, seemingly reinforced by his political creed, transform him from a judge into a counsel for the prosecution. For him the Romantic movement is a wild revolt against tradition, a mere orgy of individualist self-expression. Just as Mr. Arthur Symonds—to take a critic of the school most opposed to Dr. Courthope—rules out the whole eighteenth century as having no fundamental relation with the rest of English poetry, so Dr. Courthope seems inclined to rule out the Romantic movement, and to hope that the nation, in literature as well as in politics, will react against "the great centrifugal movement towards a visionary ideal of individual Liberty." Each critic looks on the age he dislikes as "a page inserted by Satan in God's history of the human race." The Lake poets have, according to Dr. Courthope, life, freshness, and individuality, but, instead of following the course of English poetry "which had resembled the growth of the English Constitution in the continuity of its development," they caught up ideas from the French Revolution and introduced "a certain destructive tendency by their neglect of tradition." Their poetry lacks "the 'universal' element in the widest sense of the word, so largely present in the work of their great predecessors." Byron, though less severely handled than the Lake school, does not escape the critic's strictures. He, like Wordsworth, sang of liberty, and that is a crime which demands expiation. "Wordsworth's excessive indulgence of individuality ended in imaginative monasticism; Byron's betrayed him into moral anarchy." And, in tones which remind one of Lord Rosebery denouncing Socialism as "the end of everything," Dr. Courthope passes final judgment on Romanticism, as the disintegrating force which shattered the sober and orderly structure that had provided shelter for our literature:—

"Just as the principle of abstract Liberty has proved unequal to the task of building up a fresh social order in the sphere of politics, so, in the corresponding world of the imagination, the last result of the Romantic Movement has been a separation of Poetry from the organised course of national life and action. We have seen how this tendency is expressed in the attitude of Keats—the poet whose example, since the early days of the Revolutionary Era, has, beyond all question, been most potent in determining the development of the art—towards the interests of living society. As 'the idle singer of an empty day' to small circles of refined sympathisers, the modern poet is inclined, like the story-tellers in the 'Decameron,' to seclude himself from the vision of a plague-stricken world in the pleasant gardens of Art."

In reply to this it might be urged that "the idle singer of an empty day" was the poet of our time who felt most impelled to plunge into the dusty conflicts that arise out of the organised course of national life and action, or that, in so far as modern poets have enclosed themselves in ivory towers and held aloof from the movements of their time, they have by that very action severed themselves from the poetic ideals of Shelley, of Wordsworth, and of Byron. But Dr. Courthope is too deeply imbued with "classic" sympathies to do Romanticism justice, and though throughout the volume there are many fine appreciations of the poets who are the peculiar glory of the nineteenth century, we feel that if he doles out approval with his left hand he bestows reproof with his right. Of Scott alone does he speak in a spirit of generous praise, and his admiration is due to the fact that the personal passion which animates Scott's best poetry "is not conceived like the lyrics of most of his contemporaries in an egotistic but in a social and patriotic spirit." Following the discussion of Scott's poetry comes an unexpected though welcome chapter on the Waverley Novels, and the reader is told that, in his capacity for effecting a compromise between Liberty and Order, Scott's genius is representative of the English Constitution. Apparently Dr. Courthope believes that no higher praise is possible. That this should be the case is an illustration of what we must call the weak and defective side of his work. Its merits are great and undeniable; but throughout its whole course one seems to detect a feeling in the author's mind that there must be something wrong with poetry which, though impeccable in other respects, is likely to wound the susceptibilities of the Tory Party.

WHERE ONLY MAN IS VILE.*

By his books on Oxford and Wales, the "Heart of England," the "Life of Richard Jefferies" and "The South Country," Mr. Edward Thomas has already won a distinct place among the prose writers of to-day. He is an essayist of fine temper, and in the essay it is fine temper that counts. When we venture upon this difficult form of art—all the more difficult because it looks as easy as breathing—most of us lose our temper, if we have any. We become impatient or hurried, whereas the essayist, like him who believeth, must not make haste. We give information, or sweat in the dusty wrath of polemics, whereas the smallest grain of information or of controversy brings down the essay like a shot bird. We assert, we borrow, we repeat, whereas the essay is modest as the servant of the Lord who does not strive, personal as the pupil of the eye, and new every morning.

But Mr. Thomas in all his work preserves a temper fine and serene. We do not quite mean that he never tells us anything, but he never gives information, never wrangles, and of all present writers shows, perhaps, the least sign of haste. Though the sense of polite difference is often there, it is expressed by silence—that irresistible answer—and we doubt if he has ever contradicted anyone in words. Most of our essayists have written of the Town, and are rightly qualified as urbane. We hardly know what attribute corresponds to urbanity in one who breathes of the country; for "rural" recalls a garden city and conveys no definite style of mind, whereas "gentle," which would have expressed what we mean three centuries ago, has now degenerated into dullness, and can be used of no one but the soft. We lately described Mr. Thomas as the scholar gipsy of the time, and, perhaps, that is the best description in brief, nor do we know anyone, unless it is Mr. Hudson, who has an equal claim to the title.

In this little book, all the essayist's qualities are shown, but necessarily in brief, and not always at their fullest power. Three temptations beset the essayist who meditates the country and things of low estate; we mean the temptations to pathos, melancholy, and preciousness. In this volume there are few precious phrases, though one rather shies at "a clear, hard, percussive tone" in a woman's voice. But there is no need to criticise so sane a scholar's words, and sometimes the phrase is memorable. "In spite of ferns in the fireplace, the room was cold with a moral and spiritual chill"—how well we know that room of an intellect standing aloof from life!

"Across this tainted and condemned grass, even between the houses, trotted narrow brooklets over stony beds to their sepulchres in the town sewers."

The vividness of the picture just saves the phrase from being precious. Pathos and melancholy are more difficult to avoid. Both are usual in essayists; perhaps they are necessary to the temperament, just as humor is necessary, and is melancholy's twin. But we suspect they are Mr. Thomas's greatest dangers, and here and there he hardly escapes them. He hardly escapes pathos in "The First of Spring," or melancholy in "The Maiden's Wood." Not that pathos or melancholy are bad in themselves; they are, as we say, a common part of the temperament; but it is just because they are common that Mr. Thomas can afford to leave them to writers who have not his mastery of thought and language. Besides, sentimentality is their genteel relation, and too close neighbor.

To us there are two essays in this volume that show the writer at his best—"Mothers and Sons," and "At a Cottage Door." They are the longest; they come side by side in the middle of the middle of the book (where the heaviest weight should always come in every Eight, and here we have eight essays, and a cox in the stern), and they have the most "stuff" in them. Both treat of the clash of feelings and realities that arises now in so many country parts of England; or rather, in this instance, of Wales, for Mr. Thomas is writing throughout of his own country. Both describe the squalid hideousness of town life—especially of a mining town's life—encroaching upon the purity and health of the old farms and hillside fields. But in these essays it is not merely a matter of lost picturesqueness. We have given up the beauty of the country in despair. Let it go. We are willing to seek a new kind of beauty now in chimneys and smoke and festering drains. It is the spiritual loss—the loss of Wordsworth's "grave livers"—that matters, and Mr. Thomas reveals a new meaning in that loss by contrasting the educated poet son with his ordinary and unconscious mother, occupied with the common, necessary toil of life. It is the son who laments with infinite tears of rhyme over the pollution of the river or the desecration of natural beauties. The mother takes things pretty much as they come, knowing the hard needs of existence:—

"I am sorry the fern will have to go," she says, "but, dear me, the poor of us must have shoes and bread and a pasty now and then, Mr. Phillips, and the rich must have their carriages and money to buy the poetry books, Willy." . . . I never saw a sweeter and nobler acceptance of life (the author continues). She welcomed the new without forgetting the old, and gave both their due because she felt—she would never have said it, for she would have considered such high thinking arrogant—that the new and the old, the institutions, the reforms, the shops, the drainage system, were the froth made by the deep tides of men's inexpressible perverse desires.

Yet, though she accepts the mills and mines and drains without lamentation, and, indeed, with an eye to their service, we feel that it is her heart which is the nearer to nature, being, in fact, the chief part of nature's beauty; whereas her son has no real intimacy with natural existence at all, and it is his room that is cold with a moral and spiritual chill.

We have all felt that chill of self-consciousness, of the literary spirit—how deadly a touch it lays upon the daily realities that men and women have somehow to face. And all know how the mere sight of that continued struggle under the pressure of reality shrivels the pretensions of poetising and words. No one could doubt which had the finer soul—the poet or the woman who remarked that her frying-pan had fried forty pigs—and the evil of the encroachment of the mining town upon the mountain farms lies, not in the ruin of natural scenery, but in the extinction of the life that could breed people like the poet's mother, and the substitution of creatures "small, grey-skinned, with clotted grey hair; they had scarred faces, had lost an eye and most of their teeth; they wore soiled print or black dresses, bedraggled like the plumage of a dead bird in the mud."

"One such crone," the description of the town people continues, "one such crone crawling out into the light, unclean, dull, and yet surprised, had a look as if she had just been exhumed; she might have been buried alive in the foundation of the town for luck, and have now emerged to see what had been done. They were seen outside the taverns with their hands hidden under the remains of aprons, or were queuing in the dustbins for food or unbroken glass; often they carried babies, in whose shapeless faces was hidden the power to excel their grandmothers."

That passage comes from the other essay we spoke of, describing how a Welsh farmer's wife (whose only English words were "Good-afternoon," "beautiful," and "excursion train") would sit at her cottage door and watch the flights of birds, especially the swifts, with a kind of half-belief that they embodied the departed souls, especially the souls of the crowding town below her hillside. Well, the embodiment of those dismal souls into swifts screaming through the air to their nests under cottage eaves would be a blessed transformation!

THE GREAT MIMIC.*

DIFFICULT as it is to weigh the merits of a bygone actor or enter into the feelings of those who saw his successes, it is harder still to appreciate the jester of an age preceding our own. Manners change; and what passed for a happy stroke in one generation may seem downright rudeness to the next. The jester, moreover, depends so much for effect upon all the circumstances of the occasion, upon tone and gesture, that his best things are, in their nature, transient. They are—

"like the snowfall in the river,
A moment white, then melts for ever."

The finest qualities of a good joke, as of a good speech, are condemned to perish in the using.

From this point of view it is natural that Mr. Percy Fitzgerald should expect his readers to deny his claim that his hero was "the most remarkable and one of the most gifted persons that ever figured on the English stage." Yet the claim does not overstep the truth. All his contemporaries unite in bearing witness to Foote's vogue and to the mixture of admiration and alarm he aroused. "Upon my word," wrote Horace Walpole, "if Mr. Foote be not check'd, we shall have the army itself, on its return from Boston, besieged in the Haymarket." "There is hardly a public man in England," said Davies, "who has not entered Mr. Foote's theatre with an aching heart, under the apprehension of seeing himself laughed at." Even Johnson, who tempered his admiration with criticism, felt constrained to admit that for "loud, obstreperous, broad-faced mirth" he knew not Foote's equal.

Foote's father, "a very useful magistrate," of the town of Truro and member of Parliament for Tiverton, intended his son for the legal profession. He sent him to Worcester Grammar School where—like so many other boys destined for eminence—he was the leader in a "barring-out," and afterwards to Worcester College, Oxford. He left Oxford without taking a degree, though with some reputation for scholarship, and first appeared before the world as the author of a Newgate Calendar pamphlet recounting the history and "last dying words" of one of his uncles, Captain Goodere, who had just been hanged for murdering another uncle. We next find him upon the stage, playing the part of Othello without success, and afterwards essaying that of Lord Foppington in "The Relapse," which was also a failure. Mortified but not dismayed, he determined to try something else. "If they won't have me in tragedy, and I am not fit for comedy, what the deuce am I fit for? I must find some other department for which I am fit," was his summary. He found it in mimicry, writing his own pieces, which had little plot and depended for their success on his skill in caricaturing the leading personages of the day. The form of entertainment was not entirely new. Fielding, in "Pasquin" and other pieces, had introduced Ministers upon the stage, but Walpole, who had felt the satire, passed the Licensing Act of 1737 and brought the stage under the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain. Though during his career Foote had on two or three occasions to abandon pieces which he had in rehearsal, he seems upon the whole to have experienced little trouble from the Censor. He called his entertainments "giving tea," and affected to receive his friends on a footing of social intercourse. After a time even this thin pretence was dropped. His audacity had conquered, and whether through fear or favor, the authorities made hardly an effort to suppress him.

The town talked of these entertainments, and Foote promptly became the most feared and the most flattered man in London. Mr. Fitzgerald blames him for want of dignity and of restraint. Neither the one nor the other was to be expected from Foote. He is to take or to leave—a genius in his own line, but that a line where the delicate mind hesitates to follow him. The mimicry of living persons, extending even to that of their physical misfortunes, and the public exposure of the most private details of their lives would not be tolerated to-day, yet down to the time of George IV. it was thought a social accomplishment of distinction, and Croker tells us how that monarch used to sit up in bed mimicking his late Ministers for the enjoyment of their successors. Three of his distinguished contemporaries—Goldsmith, Churchill, and Johnson—escaped Foote's lash. Goldsmith's immunity is difficult to understand, for his eccentricities invited such an attention, but in the case of the other two fear was the restraining influence. Churchill wielded a stinging pen and satirised Foote, without severity, indeed, but in such a way as to show he must not be trifled with. Johnson's defence was on cruder lines. Being told at the house of Davies, a bookseller, that Foote intended to ridicule him, he asked "what was the common price of an oak stick," and when informed that it was sixpence, replied, "Why, then, sir, give me leave to send your servant to purchase me a shilling one. I'll have a double quantity." At the same time, Johnson heartily enjoyed Foote's humor. "Garrick," he said to Boswell on the Hebridean tour, "is restrained by some principle, but Foote has the advantage of unlimited range. Garrick has some delicacy of feeling; it is possible to put him out; you may get the better of him. But Foote is the most incompressible fellow I ever knew; when you have driven him into a corner, and think you are sure of him, he runs between your legs or jumps over your head, and makes his escape." "Incompressible" is the right word for Foote.

Foote's recorded witticisms would fill volumes, and "Conversation" Cooke's "Table-Talk and Bon-mots" consists of little else. Mr. Fitzgerald says that his best-known jest is his reply to someone asking whether he had ever been to Cork: "No; but I have seen a good many drawings of it." It is a good repartee, though we think the following still better. "He described a certain Sir J. D. as 'a good sort of man,' and being pressed by a lady to explain what he called a good sort of man, 'Why, madam,' he said, 'one who preserves all the exterior decencies of ignorance.'" Of course, the most famous story told of Foote is that of the "nonsense" speech. Macklin had been holding forth at a lecture on methods of strengthening the memory by repeating strings of words, and boasting that he could repeat immediately what he had once read. Foote is said to have at once written down the following, challenging the lecturer to get it by heart on the spot:—

"So she went into the garden to cut a cabbage-leaf to make an apple-pie, and, at the same time, a great she-bear, coming up the street, pops its head into the shop. 'What, no soap!' So he died, and she very imprudently married the barber; and there were present the Pieninnies and the Joblillies and Garolillies and the Grand Panjamdrum himself, with the little round button at the top, and they all fell to playing the game of Catch-as-catch-can till the gunpowder ran out at the heels of their boots."

It is doubtful whether this piece of incongruous humor was spontaneous, but it is a classic of its kind.

Mr. Fitzgerald's book is not free from repetitions, nor is the arrangement always the best, but it is thoroughly readable, and gives a fair picture of one of the greatest of English jesters.

STORIES OF EAST AND WEST.*

THE descriptions in "The Human Cobweb" are so good that it is a pity the novel as a whole is not better. Mr. Putnam Weale has gained a firm reputation by his brilliant books on the Far East, and now, in this "Romance of Old Peking," he brings before us the China of 1898, as it appeared to the eyes of Europeans, on the eve of the coup d'état by the Dowager Empress, and the attack on the European Legations. Like many a clever man before him, Mr. Weale has not quite understood that the novel is one of the most complex and exacting forms of art, necessitating a most skilful handling of character, and an instinct for proportion, balance, and concentration in the arrangement of the narrative. He has sought to enhance his matter by creating the machinery of a regulation plot, in which intriguing European concession-hunters, backed by big financial houses at home, are shown against the barbaric background of Peking's seething life. But to present with dexterity and force this big international picture, in which the great Powers are seen putting greedy fingers into the Chinese pie, would tax the powers of a Zola. Mr. Putnam Weale has been too ambitious. What really counts in his picture is the vivid feeling imparted of the Asiatic atmosphere of the great Tartar city, and of the crumbling Manchu dynasty. All the "information" dispensed to us, in the shape of Legation tittle-tattle and diplomatic tappings of the political barometer, clashes inartistically with the sharp impression made on the nerves by this rich barbaric pageant of Asiatic life.

We may pass over the first five chapters, which set forth how Peter Kerr, the rising young engineer, persuaded the great banker, Sir Peter Lindley, and his syndicate to back his scheme of the Linked Chinese Trunk Lines, and send him out to Peking to obtain the concession. The "love interest" of the story is introduced in these pages, one which has so little to do with the main theme that the two ladies concerned are packed off by the author on a voyage to Japan in the last chapters, in order that they may turn up in China and contrive a sentimental ending! Such clumsy art defeats the author's purpose. Equally irritating is the subsidiary love intrigue in which Peter Kerr falls a victim to the wiles of the wife of the rival Belgian concession-

A CALL: The Tale of Two Passions.

By FORD MADDOX HUEFFER.

"Full of neat description and lifelike touches. . . . The story has a new and rather curious concrete interest apart from the psychology. This hangs round a 'call,' an actual telephone call, which finds a man in a house where he has no business to be. Involuntarily he owns to his identity, then hangs up the receiver in a panic, and is henceforth haunted by terror of the unknown who has 'rung him up.' It is a good idea for a story, and cleverly developed here; but the greatest interest remains in the writing and the brilliant dissections of character and motive."—The Observer.

hunter, Madame Boisragon, who steals the engineer's papers, and so brings the syndicate's projects to naught. Much better drawn are the character sketches of Carnot, the cynical Swiss who keeps the hotel where the concession-hunters foregather, and of Lorenzo, the Italian, who shows Kerr the ropes, and teaches him how to bribe the Chinese dignitaries. The interview with the high Manchu Prince, in Chapter XVIII., when the interpreters discreetly withdraw and the Prince examines the Englishman's cheque and then slips it into his cloth boot, is subtle in humor. But it is by the brilliant descriptions of the Peking streets and the surrounding landscape that the author discloses exceptional powers. These scenes have a cumulative effect on the reader, and must be read leisurely, if their true flavor is to be enjoyed. We quote, however, a typical passage:—

"Then on the high driving-road the reason of the saute qui peut was made clear. Soldiers were coming—many soldiers evidently.

"Slashing about them with their short riding-whips and riding recklessly was a confused mass of savage-looking cavalry, who from their looks might have been Genghiz Khan's horsemen revived from the dead. Their black turbans folded low down, and half-masking their bronzed faces, their loose tunics of crimson cloth, edged with black velvet, their tiger-skirts of the same brilliant coloring, which they wore over their legs—all these things were strangely barbaric and strangely threatening. Each man had a carbine slung on his back, and a heavy curved sword at his side, whilst some had bandoliers of cartridges and others none. Mixed together, and yet preserving instinctively the curious formation of irregular cavalry—the cavalry which lumps its horses as closely as possible in knots of dissimilar size—they presented a remarkable spectacle. . . . They now saw advancing a dense mass of these picturesque horsemen, with a group of great black and yellow banners flaunting high above them. There were perhaps a dozen of these huge barbaric triangular flags, hanging down so low that they literally draped their bearers and their bearers' ponies. The tramp of so many countless hoofs raised great clouds of dust, which floated ever more densely, and at times almost completely enveloped the long lines of men and animals. In the brilliant light flooding the roadway and catching the violent red of the men's tunics—with the gaudily painted shop-fronts framing it all—it made a wonderful morning scene.

"For a while this host advanced like this in stern silence. . . . Suddenly the music began—a music which once heard can never be forgotten. Beginning to blow irregularly, the trumpeters first touched a high note and held it in long, quavering, mournful, thrilling blasts—blasts which were constantly reinforced by the music of other trumpeters, who, joining in this strange chorus as they felt inclined, made the volume of sound rise and sink in a blood-tingling manner."

Another admirable description recounts with much nervous force the attack of an enraged Chinese mob on English tourists who have interfered to save from execution by drowning a luckless couple of sinners against village law. The author has the art of steeping his scenes in historical coloring, so that we obtain a most suggestive picture of the immense antiquity of the Chinese civilisation. It is too late to ask Mr. Weale to recast his story; but if he is in search of an artistic model on which to frame any future impressions of Eastern life, he could not do better than take M. Pierre Loti's "L'Inde sans les Anglais."

In "Such and Such Things" Mr. Mark Allerton has made a minor hit with a novel that, we trust, will be appreciated north of the Tweed. The hero, David Logan, the son of a canny linen draper in the Gorbals, Glasgow, being "anxious tae get on," procures a situation as a minor clerk in the London house of Cardigan, Sons, and Johns, Limited, wholesale drapers. The ruthless but diverting description of the process by which David slowly pushes his way to the front, guided by the maxim, "ambeetion and moderation will carry ye anywhere," might seem a little satirical to the softer southerner, but its psychological truth is indisputable. David never loses an opportunity, and when he has found one "he holds on to it like grim death and with tireless energy." He plods, he keeps on doing things—little things—and always keeps his eyes fixed on the man in front of him. He falls in love with the charming girl, Miss Barker, a typewriter in his office, but when, owing to Mr. Cardigan's sudden illness, he becomes, practically, the manager of the firm, he instantly perceives that he must not do anything to blight his prospects, and so Miss Barker must be got rid of. Slowly he matures his cautious plan, and on the day that the staff is reduced, when two typists and Miss Barker get a week's notice, David travels north and does not return for ten days. And when Mr. Cardigan offers him a partnership, and the handsome daughter, Esmé

Cardigan, takes notice of him, David is still the hard man of business: "It was not a bad catch! And she would have money, too. But he determined not to be in too big a hurry. He wasn't going to let himself go too cheap." Equally grim is the analysis of David's relations with his old parents. He is fond of them, but never gives himself away. "Ye'll be makin' a lot o' money," inquires his father. "A bitty," said David, cautiously. "Whiles more than at other times." So David prospers and prospers, and when his employer dies he matures his plans. Nobody save himself shall have a say in the firm's management. He travels down to Eastbourne after a year's cautious waiting to propose marriage point-blank to Esmé. But Mrs. Cardigan tells him that her daughter will not have him, because she is in love with another man. So David takes another road to reach his goal. The end is admirable in its irony. Esmé, when she enters, indignantly stops David's long-winded explanations. "I know what you are going to say. Well, I'm glad to finish it now and for ever," she bursts out:—

David suddenly laughed. Esmé flushed crimson with shame and mortification, and he laughed again.

"Yes," he said; "you are extraordinary. There's no mistake about it. I've never heard anything so extraordinary in my life. Man! but it's funny, too."

He laughed again. "It's terrible funny."

"What on earth do you mean?" Esmé turned paler. She clenched her hands with a sudden apprehension.

"I mean, I wasn't going to propose to you at all. You mistook me entirely. You were a bit too previous. Ha! ha! ha! But it's terribly funny. The fact is—" He cleared his throat. Esmé was staring at him with fascinated eyes. She would have liked to have swept away his grin of triumph with a blow of her hand. "The fact is, it was your mother I proposed to."

"And she—" Esmé panted.

"Aye, she accepted me. I'll be your stepfather soon, Esmé."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE object of Mr. E. J. Bedford's "Nature Photography for Beginners" (Dent, 7s. 6d. net), is to show how one may begin photography and nature study simultaneously, and combine the two in one wholesome and comparatively inexpensive recreation. There was certainly room for a book of this class, for the best known publications on the subject, while they have revealed nature photography as a fascinating hobby, have also suggested the great difficulty in the way of the ordinary person taking it up. Results such as those achieved by the brothers Kearton and Mr. Oliver Pike have seemed to demand a degree of skill, endurance, and opportunity that prohibited the average student from any attempt at rivalry; whereas Mr. Bedford's book proves how, with quite normal intelligence, patience, and care, one can extract a large amount of enjoyment and instruction from the pursuit, at but little cost, by confining one's attention to simple and accessible subjects. He takes his reader for a series of Saturday afternoon walks with a camera in his own neighborhood; instructs him as to what "nature" to look for, and how to photograph it when found; and—what is especially valuable—demonstrates the advantages of stereoscopic photography to the operator who aims at strong results. Nearly a hundred stereoscopic pictures of his own are reproduced in this volume, and they make an illuminating record of his achievements. The book opens with a description of suitable apparatus for the work, and essentials such as a long focus camera, a good lens, and a noiseless shutter are insisted upon. An account of the photographic processes follows, which errs only in being a trifle too lengthy; we are then introduced to the "excursions," which chapters contain much sage advice and a quantity of information on the ways of birds and the fashion of their nests, on the beasts of the field and farmyard that offer themselves as subjects, and on insects and flowers. One chapter gives several entertaining facts and photographs relating to birds' nests found in such unexpected places as a drawing-room mantelshelf, a schoolroom curtain, an old hat, and so forth. Mr. Bedford has essayed a large field of nature observation, and the intimacy and enthusiasm displayed in his pages mark him as a worthy disciple of Gilbert White and other famous predecessors.

IN the City excitement is divided between the financial and political deadlock at Westminster on the one hand, and the boom in rubber and oil shares on the other. Another general election would be most unpopular. Most City men are quite willing now that the Budget shall pass, however desperately they battled against it a few weeks ago. Trade prospects are too good now to make Tariff Reform a going concern in the minds of business men. The money situation is puzzling, simply because no one knows what the Government will do or how much it will need in short loans to tide over the crisis. The market made quite a mistake over the one month Treasury bills. After the financial year it is probable that a large amount will be borrowed in six months' bills, and a pretty big issue of Exchequer bonds is also predicted. It all depends on the question how soon the Budget can be passed and the Income tax regularised. The comic element is that the Irish Nationalists by their line against the Budget are simply postponing the day when our wealthy men shall pay their share to Old Age Pensions. Meanwhile, apart from oil and rubber, the stock markets are rather quiet. Argentine railways have been going down on well-informed selling. The foreign market is rather interesting. Several City loans—St. Petersburg, Constantinople, and Copenhagen, in particular—are being arranged, and there is talk of a Peruvian Corporation reconstruction in Paris which has sent up the loan a good deal. The American market is dead, the operations of the New York bankers being regarded with much suspicion, though prices are much lower than last November, when inspired journalists were booming American railroad and securities.

THE BUDGET.

There is much curiosity in the City about the Budget. Is it going to be postponed to the Greek Kalends? I am told that the drink interest in London is pulling many strings to bring "whisky" and "beer" pressure upon the Irish Nationalists, so that the Budget may be rejected. The result if they succeed will be heavy loss to Ireland, for the higher rates on income-tax and death duties are just the revenues to which Ireland contributes least, and the sums paid in whisky and other customs duties can never be returned, as they have been passed on to the consumers. There is nothing in English law to make a Budget necessary. If no income-tax is required, forty or fifty millions could be raised annually by loan. But the effect on national credit will be tremendous, and Ireland will smart first, because of the constant issues of Irish land stock. Ireland only contributes about 4 per cent. to the new revenue, while it gets more than a quarter (25 per cent.) of the new expenditure.

RUBBER AND OIL.

To the rubber boom the Stock Exchange has added an oil boom for some mysterious reason. It is supposed that oil is being more and more used for fuel, and that the oil producing companies are likely to make great profits. I should fancy that speculation in this line is likely to prove unfortunate. Rubber share prices have also reached a very dangerous point, even allowing that the high price of rubber makes rubber production fabulously profitable. The remarkable thing is that these prices do not seem to check consumption very much—possibly because it is largely required for the luxuries of the rich. People argue now that if the price falls a little the use of rubber for such purposes as paving streets will become quite common. However that may be, London must have made many fortunes out of rubber during the last two or three years. Most of the share business is transacted in Mincing Lane. The Stock Exchange list of rubber shares is quite small. Some of the Mincing Lane brokers have two departments—one for rubber, the other for rubber shares.

A "SCIENTIFIC" TARIFF.

I have always held that there is no such thing as a "scientific" tariff. The impartial expert never has been the framer of a Protectionist tariff, and never will be. It is a case of influence. The strongest and most unscrupulous interest always gets the pull. The weaker goes to the wall, and the poor are always fleeced. Just now a "scientific" tariff is being concocted by the Japanese Government. We see it in the making in an interview, recently published by the "Asahi," with M. Sakurai, director of the Tariff Bureau. The general object of the tariff is, of course, to increase Protection; but the director has a very peculiar set of arguments, which leave the mind in a delightful state of bewilderment. Let me reproduce some of his remarks:—

"The total amount of iron turned out in Japan is only sufficient to supply one-fifth of the demand, and all the remainder has to be imported. Some persons are of opinion that the tariff on iron should be increased for the encouragement of the home industry, but this view is altogether wrong. In these days of industrial expansion, iron, the most necessary material for manufacturing industries, must be supplied as cheaply as possible. With this end in view the present statutory rate of 30 per cent. has been reduced to 15 per cent. with regard to iron rods and bars, wire rods, &c."

As a matter of fact, however, this is not a decrease at all but an increase, as these goods are at present subject to duties of only 10 to 7½ per cent. by virtue of Conventional arrangements! So M. Sakurai's argument is in direct conflict with his proposals. Let us now turn to what he says about machinery and other manufactures of iron, &c.:—

"Many of those who are interested in manufacturing industry insist that on machinery and other goods manufactured of iron and other metals duties higher than those on the raw metals should be imposed. It is argued, for instance, that if a duty of 15 per cent. is imposed on iron it is only reasonable that a duty of 25 or 30 per cent. should be imposed on machinery. This view, however, is not sound when the undeveloped state of the manufacturing industry of the country is taken into consideration, and when it is remembered that Japan stands badly in need of cheap productive machinery. For this reason it has been decided to impose only light duties of from 15 to 20 per cent. on locomotive engines, machinery, &c."

If cheapness of production were the end in view, of course machinery, coal, clothing, and the food of the operatives would come in free.

OF THE "NATION."

PUBLIC OPINION

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

Despite the fact that PUBLIC OPINION was first published in 1861 and has trebled its circulation in the last eighteen months, many people do not yet know it. The manager, therefore, makes a Special Offer to Readers of the "NATION."

HE WILL SEND "PUBLIC OPINION" TO ANY ADDRESS FREE OF CHARGE FOR FOUR WEEKS TO THOSE WHO FILL UP THE COUPON BELOW

so that new readers may have a chance of examining it and seeing whether PUBLIC OPINION is not a paper which they should take in every week.

This offer should be of special advantage to those who live in country districts or abroad, and who find it difficult to get odd copies of papers—though every newsagent can secure PUBLIC OPINION quite easily.

SCOTLAND VOTES FOR "PUBLIC OPINION."

The men of intellect in Scotland vote strongly for PUBLIC OPINION as a First-rate Journal, as the following striking statements show:—

SIR W. M. RAMSAY (Aberdeen), the great authority on Asia Minor, says:—

"I have for some considerable time been a regular subscriber to PUBLIC OPINION and never care to miss it for a week."

SIR ALEXANDER SIMPSON
(Edinburgh). Rev. H. L. Simpson,
M.A., writes:—

"My father, SIR ALEXANDER SIMPSON, has been so delighted with PUBLIC OPINION that his enthusiasm moved me to take it in also—for which I am increasingly thankful."

THE RIGHT HON. R. B. HALDANE, M.P., in a letter to the Editor of Public Opinion, says:—

"What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on the right lines."

RT. HON. THE EARL OF ROSEBURY, K.G., in a letter to the Editor of Public Opinion, says:—

"I can truly say that PUBLIC OPINION is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL,
LL.D., Editor of the British Weekly, writes:—

"Though a fairly diligent reader of newspapers, I never take up my PUBLIC OPINION without finding many things I had contrived to overlook. It is not surprising that the paper is growing a favourite with the busy man who wishes to miss nothing and cannot afford to wade through the daily newspapers. Lord Rosebery, who is an assiduous newspaper reader, has recently testified the esteem in which he holds PUBLIC OPINION. Readers who have not seen PUBLIC OPINION will do well to order a copy. If they do so I shall be surprised if they do not become subscribers."

OBJECT OF "PUBLIC OPINION."

TWOPENCE WEEKLY.

The object of Public Opinion is, while focussing the opinions and news of the week as given in the world's best newspapers, magazines, and books, to emphasise those movements and opinions which are becoming important and which promise to loom large in the future.

Public Opinion emphasises the fact that there is news in ideas as well as in the ordinary facts of life—for ideas rule the world.

The busy man who wishes to keep in touch with the world's intellectual and political activity needs some one journal which shall focus into one convenient shape something of the great accumulation of news, ideas, and opinions—something of the teeming interest of every aspect of life, and which by its very selection shall emphasise the things that are best worth knowing. This Public Opinion essays to do, and in so doing to emphasise the best traditions of the British race.

The increasing pace, too, at which life is lived makes such a paper more than ever necessary to a large number of people, because they lack the time to keep themselves informed without it. This increasing pace of life also involves the increased need for intelligence on the part of the average man. Public Opinion, therefore, specially appeals to the busy man, who, though busy, must keep in touch with what the world is thinking, saying, and doing, if he is to maintain his own efficiency and culture.

Public Opinion is on sale at all Newsagents or Bookstalls.

Public Opinion will be sent on application to any place in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d. a year, or to any place in the world for 13s.

To every particular Member of Parliament,

The humble Address of the Sope-makers of London that lately presented their Petition to this Honourable House,

S H E W E T H,

He Complaint of the Sope-makers in briefis, That by reason of an Excise laid upon their Materials, and after they have made them into Sope, They are forced to pay 4s. 8d. per Barrel Excise; by meanes of which, those that make it in holes and corners, steal the Excise of the said 4s. 8d. per Barrel, and so are able to undersell them that pay it; by meanes whereof their Trade is lost and destroyed. For remedy of which, they humbly desire the Parliament will be pleased to lay 12d. per l. Excise upon all the imported Materials that Sope is made of, and totally take off the foresaid 4s. 8d. per Barrel; which they humbly conceive will bring in annually, an equal revenue to what hath risen of late years, both out of the Excise of Sope, and the 6d. in every 20s. that the Materials have paid, whereby all that make Sope shall equally bear the burthen of the Excise; and in case the Parliament shall Judge the said 12d. per pound Excise upon the materials, not to be enough, they leave it to their Judgements and discretions to lay so much more above the said 12d. in every 20s. upon the Materials onely, as they Judge annually will fully make up the same.

And they most humbly desire that the Parliament would speedily put this their Just Sute to an absolute and final issue, and call upon Colonel George Thompson to make his Report in the premises.

Diary of the Week.

THE crisis in Liberal policy, and the alarm that ran through the constituencies at the thought that the Government were either pursuing the wrong road or faltering on the right one, have, we hope, been ended by the Prime Minister's announcement on Monday. Mr. Asquith stated that the Government would adopt the method for the destruction of the Veto, urged in these columns and commended to him by Mr. Redmond, of first proceeding by Resolutions introduced both in the Commons and in the Lords. These motions will affirm, first, the total exclusion of the Peers from finance, and, secondly, the restriction of their Veto on the lines proposed by Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman—namely, within the life of a single Parliament. The third resolution will lay down the lines of a Bill to be introduced next year with a view of substituting a democratic for an hereditary Second Chamber. As soon as they are passed, a Veto Bill will be introduced, and on the fate of that proposal the Government stake their fortunes and existence. In other words, reform will be conditional upon the Veto, and the Liberal Party will only be asked to set its seal to a subordinate Second Chamber.

CONFIDENCE thus set up was strengthened by the Chancellor's deliberate statement that the Government did not intend to "plough the sands," and would not continue in office unless they could insure that their proposals would not only go through the Commons but pass into law. "The Government," he added, "will absolutely stake their existence upon the advice they will give their Sovereign, if ever it becomes necessary to do so." Mr. George pleaded for a spirit of unity and comradeship in a cause in which Irish and British democracy were equally concerned. As to the question of reform, he adopted Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's line that it was entirely independent of the restriction of the Veto. In this situation both the Tory and Irish Parties decided to abstain, and the Government's motion was carried without a division.

* * *

MR. ASQUITH's minor demand on the House was to give the Government all its time for necessary Supply and borrowings up to March 24th. This demand Mr. Balfour conceded, much to the chagrin of his following. He criticised the resolutions, said that the Coalition showed a passionate desire to destroy the House of Lords but not to pass the People's Budget, hinted that the House of Lords could not lose control over finance unless it was protected against "tacking," and declared it absurd to abolish the House of Lords in one year and to set it up again in the second with a chance of passing Home Rule in the interval. Mr. Redmond, faced with a large concession to his old scheme of tactics, advanced some way to meet it. Like Mr. Healy, he taunted the Conservative leader with his obvious fear of a dissolution, and again insisted that the Government should act up to the Albert Hall policy, discharge its pledge on the Veto, and call for guarantees to make it effective. The Radicals, similarly placated, withdrew their amendment, while pleading for a Bill in place of resolutions.

* * *

ON Thursday the position was made clearer by a declaration from the Prime Minister firmer and more specific than any that had preceded it. His intention was, he said, "to ask the House to dispose of the Budget as soon as the resolutions relative to the House of Lords have been passed through the House of Commons." Asked whether he also meant to embody the resolutions in a Bill, he added that the Government would try to get their proposals on to the Statute Book "at the earliest possible moment," and quoted the Chancellor's significant phrase on Monday that the Government would not remain in office unless they felt they were in a position to pass the Veto Bill through the Lords. In other words, the Government will probably test their quarrel with the Lords by sending up the resolutions in April, and, on their defeat or mal-treatment by that House, will ask the King if he can create Peers. The alternative method would be to give the Lords a second chance with a Veto Bill. In either case, if the King declines the Ministry's request, made in the name of a new Parliament and, presumably, on behalf of a decisive majority, either a referendum or an appeal to the country must follow, probably in May, encouraged this time by a definite pledge from the Crown to see a Veto Bill through. It is necessary, therefore, for Progressives all over the country to rouse themselves for instant agitation and action.

THE Irish-Liberal entente, therefore, is almost re-established, but the fate of the Budget is still doubtful. Meanwhile, as Mr. Bowles said, taxes are being collected without authority, and the Government are asking taxpayers to lend them money at 2½ per cent. which they ought to get without any interest at all. The Treasury is to borrow more money, and there will be an additional diversion—amounting to £6,300,000—of the new Sinking Fund from the payment of debt. [However, the general prospect of a rehabilitation of finance is rapidly clearing. In particular, it is obvious that the land taxes are desired by the Irish in Great Britain almost as passionately as by their British friends, and have a strong body of support in Ireland. The chances are, indeed, that Mr. Redmond and his party will support the Budget as soon as the Veto resolutions are through the Commons, and the constitutional issue has been firmly pressed to its conclusion. Failing some such solution, the Lords might claim that they had won the fight, and that their action in "referring" the Budget had been endorsed by a majority of the new House of Commons.

MR. BALFOUR's waiting policy was fiercely resented by the Protectionists. On Wednesday the "Morning Post" came out with a triple attack on his leadership, declaring that the Government had completely outwitted him, and that, instead of "tossing a blank cheque to the Prime Minister across the table," he should, if possible, have turned him out. The Opposition had now lost the chance, perhaps for ever, of fighting the election on their own ground, and, through "blundering incompetence," a possible "revision of food duties" was seriously, and perhaps hopelessly, delayed. "One is tempted to exclaim," writes "Parliamentarian" in the "Post's" largest type, "'To your tents, O Israel.' Go and convert Lancashire and Yorkshire, and leave alone regions like Westminster!" But what if Yorkshire and Lancashire are inconvertible?

* * *

THE difficulty of the Opposition is that the control of the situation has now passed from its hands, for the Government will probably interleave the Budget with the Veto resolutions, and send both up to the Lords simultaneously, with the assent of the Irish, whose main object is secured. The Budget will then go up unaltered, and Customs resolutions can be passed setting up a new scale of whisky duties by the end of July. It would be a mistake to combine one Budget with another, for no summary process could be applied to the new instrument, such as would naturally be used to carry the old, and no such procedure will, we imagine, be attempted. Meanwhile, the pretended zeal of the Tories for restoring the financial situation which the Lords dashed to ruin has attained a point at which Lord Lansdowne, the Arch-anarch, proposes to draw the attention of the House of Lords to the Government's "delay" in providing for the needs of the year!

MEANWHILE, the elections have furnished satisfactory evidence of the fact that the ranks of the party are closed and prepared to fight the next phase of the great battle. At St. George's-in-the-East, Mr. Benn, one of the new Whips, has been returned by a majority of 509, against a surplus of 434 at the General Election. The Irish voters were left free by their central organisation to follow their individual views of Mr. Benn's candidature, and unhesitatingly replied by voting for him en masse. The threatened Labor opposition to Mr. Pease and Colonel Seely in Rotherham and Ilkeston has also been suspended, with a sharp warning against dalliance with the supreme issue of the Veto. Finally, the Ministerial ranks have been greatly strengthened by Mr. Illingworth's appointment as Liberal Whip. Therefore, for the first time for many years, the Whips' office is now fairly representative of the prevailing sentiment in the party and in close and intelligent touch with the Parliamentary following.

ON Monday the process of repatriating the Chinese laborers on the Rand was completed, and the last batch of coolies left for their homes. Thus an obligation of honor and interest has been thoroughly fulfilled. The Chinese experiment was condemned on every ground—moral, social, and economic—on which popular opinion in 1906 had declared against it. It never was a success. The Chinese were badly recruited, and in some instances they were treated more like slaves than like free men. Frightful abuses arose, and the laborer proved on the whole to be dear, inefficient, and rebellious. Since repatriation began, white labor on the Rand has increased, on the admission of the chairman of the Johannesburg Chamber of Mines, by 18 per cent., and improved machinery and a more thoughtful use of black labor have brought about the largest output which the Witwatersrand has known. All these results were accomplished by one of the wisest decisions that democracy has ever taken.

ON Wednesday the House of Commons opened a debate on the naval situation, which arose out of a Supplementary Estimate of £689,100, £457,000 of which is for the four "contingent 'Dreadnoughts.'" These ships were ordered in January, and are to be finished by the end of March, 1912. During the debate even the pale wraith of the spring scare and its successors which remained after the election vanished. Neither Mr. Asquith's nor Mr. McKenna's 17 German "Dreadnoughts" in 1912 made their appearance, to say nothing of Mr. Balfour's grotesque calculations of 21 to 25. On the other hand, it was shown that we are now building improved "Dreadnoughts" in 23 months and destroyers in 18. Lord Charles Beresford was, as usual, tripped on his facts, and again attributed the whole naval difficulty to our "insane advertisement" of "Dreadnoughts." As it is now acknowledged that with the four accelerated "Dreadnoughts" we shall, in 1912, have 20 such ships to German's 13 (plus an overwhelming superiority in other types of battleships), we may conclude that the Government will limit the "big ship" programme of 1910 to these vessels.

THE French Budget has passed the Chamber, after weary and heated discussions. It leaves the country facing a prospective deficit of six millions, due, like our own of last year, in part to costly social reforms, and in part to armaments. Old Age Pensions, hurriedly passed in 1906 on the eve of the General Election, will at last, after this long interval of delay, become law, before the deputies again face their constituents in May. It is, thanks chiefly to the obstruction of the Senate, a timid and exiguous scheme, which confers a miserable dole on a contributory basis, the burden being divided between the worker, the employer, and the State. The cost to the State will be 5½ millions. At the instance of M. Jaurès, the revenue from a newly graduated scheme of death duties has been assigned specifically to the service of Old Age Pensions—an expanding revenue levied exclusively on the propertied class. These duties show a double graduation: first, according to the amount of the inheritance, and then according to the degree of kinship. The maximum in the case of children who inherit from parents is only 6½ per cent. The timidity of the democratic party which rejoices in the bold name of Radical-Socialist, and obeys the spur, not of a Labor, but of a Socialist group, makes a striking contrast to the achievement of our own Liberalism without adjectives.

THE Prussian Social Democrats continue with great ingenuity and spirit to keep the agitation simmering against the three-class franchise. There are continual interpellations and discussions, now in the Diet and now in the Reichstag, on some phase or other of the repression. Street demonstrations, organised no one knows how, continue to occur as if by chance in Berlin. A mass meeting in Treptow Park, formally forbidden, is also likely to take place on Sunday—no one can prevent people who happen to desire universal franchise from chancing to take their walk in the park. The "intellectuals" and the professional class are also moving in the same direction in a more timid and decorous way. In the Diet itself it is now probable that there will be a Centre-Conservative coalition to secure the secrecy of the ballot. But, perhaps, the most interesting symptom of the ferment is the appearance of an article by Count Posadowsky, the clever and progressive Minister whom Prince Bülow dismissed for opposing the Bloc policy. It is a solemn warning from the south German standpoint of the disruptive tendencies which are latent in the perseverance of Prussia in a policy of reaction. We fancy he goes too far in hinting that there really is a danger to German unity. But undoubtedly Herr von Bethmann Hollweg's speech put a severe strain on the good temper, if not the loyalty, of south Germans.

By far the most interesting social feature of the week has been the proceedings of the Divorce Commission. The evidence has been widely diverse and, indeed, directly contradictory, but it has abounded in vivid lights on the life of the people. On the whole, it has tended to establish three propositions: (1) that the cost of actions before the High Court makes divorce a monopoly of the rich; (2) that some recourse to the County Courts, which have taken over so much protective legislation from the higher tribunals, is advisable, and (3) that separation orders are a powerful cause of loose living among the poor. On the question of how marriage is regarded by large masses of the English poor, whether the terms of divorce should be equal for men and for women, and whether easier means of divorce would not be a cure for the evils of separation, widely different views were heard. In the course of some striking evidence, Sir George Lewis insisted that the divorce court was widely used as leverage for blackmail.

* * *

KING FERDINAND's visit to the Russian Court has caused some perturbation both in Vienna and Constantinople. The reconciliation between Russia and Austro-Hungary has apparently gone much less far than had been supposed. Verbal as well as written communications are now exchanged, and this apparently is the extent of the rapprochement. King Ferdinand apparently set out with the intention of asking Russia to intervene on behalf of the Macedonian Bulgars. In this object he has failed. Russia, as the "Novoe Vremya" explains, desires peace before all else; she sympathises with Bulgaria, and she advises her to join Turkey and Servia in some sort of Balkan Federation. We shall hear, in due course, what decoration or ceremonial honor King Ferdinand has accepted instead. There is, fortunately, some relenting in the Young Turkish severities towards the Bulgars of Macedonia. But we have grave doubts whether Constantinople really is capable of an honest and cordial policy of appeasement. It fears the Bulgars too much to allow itself to trust them.

TOWARDS the Albanians, also, a thoroughly reactionary policy is being pursued, which has led to some rioting at Monastir. They are, indeed, allowed to cultivate their language and to conduct their own vernacular schools, privileges denied by the old régime. But efforts are being made to compel at least the Moslem Albanians to crush their European language into the impossible medium of the Arabic alphabet. This childishness means two things: (1) a survival of the old hieratic Oriental fancy that the alphabet is a religious symbol, and that it is, therefore, impious for Moslems to use a Latin script, and (2) the more serious determination to divide the Moslem Albanians, a singularly tolerant and secular-minded group, from their Christian race fellows. On such lines as these the Young Turks are heading towards disruption and disaster.

MR. TAFT seems to be nearing a crisis in his dealings with the House of Representatives. He is fighting a two-handed battle against the party "bosses" on the one hand, and the Republican "insurgents" on the other. He seems to be aware that the former are men who have made politics a business, and that their influence will be used to frustrate all effective dealing with the Trusts, as it was used to procure the high protection of the Payne Tariff. These men he gently rebukes, and tries to manage. His fulminations are reserved for the "insurgents," who really have at heart the reforms which he professes to desire. Their hostility to the Payne Tariff is not, perhaps, the expression of a conscious Free Trade conviction. It is rather due to a perception that this Tariff was the work of the Trusts, which can maintain their monopoly and accumulate their vast reserves of unearned profit only behind its wall. There is also, as the "Times" correspondent points out, a powerful moral element in this economic movement. It is strong and it is spreading, sometimes as an independent revolt within Republicanism, sometimes in alliance with the Democrats. The question of the moment is to know how far the "bosses" are capable of making real concessions to the insurgents in order to retain votes, given the fact that they can do so only by deserting the Trusts. So far, Mr. Taft's first year of office has been barren of reforms.

* * *

FRENCH policy has achieved a momentary triumph in Morocco, and Mulai Hafid has been compelled, at the point of an ultimatum, to accept the onerous terms negotiated in Paris. He will dismiss his Turkish officers, employ none but French instructors, and settle down under the weight of a crushing debt controlled by French banks. It means the beginning of a French control, and only a very sanguine Imperialist would suppose that, when its consequences are fully understood by the Moors, whose mood is now said to be one of "contented consternation," the "penetration" can be altogether "pacific." Meanwhile, in the parallel case of Persia, the last stage is apparently in sight. The Mejliss still hesitates to accept the terms of the Anglo-Russian loan, which enforces at once foreign control of the armed forces of finance, coupled with a further step towards partition. The Sipahdar (Prime Minister) and the Sirdar Assad (the leader of the Bakhtiari clansmen) have both resigned from the Ministry. It is not known whether their object is to avoid the responsibility for a painful surrender or to coerce the Mejliss into accepting the loan.

Politics and Affairs.

THE APPEAL TO THE CROWN.

THE week's debates in Parliament should serve to remind the country that every tittle of the burden laid upon it by the Lords last November still lies upon its back. At the end of the financial year it is likely to be about twenty-five millions short of its proper revenue. It is borrowing to meet the deficiency, and paying for the accommodation. Its Government cannot legally tax; such taxes as are being paid are collected because of popular faith in the ultimate power of the Commons to legalise the acts of the officials. The Ministry has no immediate power to end this confusion, save by surrendering the right which Gladstone obtained for it nearly fifty years ago, through the instrument now called the Finance Bill. Even if it carried the Budget instantly through the representative House, it has no valid reason to suppose that the non-representative one would assent to it. The two Houses remain at complete variance, gripped in the "deadlock" which Lord Salisbury prophesied as the sure result of the Lords' interference with a Budget. One Chamber has virtually refused a passage to all Liberal Bills; on that the other declines to submit to its enemy any Bills but one for the destruction of the arbitrary power of the Peers. One election has been taken upon this question. If it is held to decide nothing, another, yielding the same or nearly the same results, may be equally fruitless. Revolutionists on the Tory side, like Lord Rosebery, assume and defend this defeat of the Constitution. They hope that it will endure till a countering movement of "reform" can be set up, and some plausible amalgam of peers, professors, pro-consuls, and superior persons of Conservative beliefs or tendencies can be set up to cloak the naked enormity which now obstructs representative government, and at the same time to double its ability to stop progress. Meanwhile, let the House of Commons turn to Toryism, or go on stewing in its Radical juice! We have, in a word, attained to a complete perversion of constitutional right; a situation in which the Crown and the Commons are to exist in subordination to the hereditary power, the one having been refused supplies, the other being called upon to share the power of the purse. We have thus completely realised the revolutionary state of things sketched by Lord Grey in 1832: "I say that if a majority of this House should have the power of acting adversely to the Crown and the Commons, and was determined to exercise that power, without being liable to check or control, the Constitution is completely altered, and the government of this country is not a limited monarchy; it is no longer, my lords, the Crown, the Lords, and the Commons, but the House of Lords—a separate oligarchy, governing absolutely the others."

Now, the argument of the revolutionists is, in essence, that the only remedy for this state of things, which must lead, unless it is checked, to the employment of armed force, is for the representative House to yield, because there is no constitutional power which can bring it into harmony with the House of Lords. To this argument, which infers a permanent recalcitrancy of the peers, the Liberal Party replies that every constitutional authority admits, or implies, both the existence of such a power and the right to use it. That power is the Crown. Without it, and the weapon it wields, the representative principle practically comes to an end. To be effective it must always come to one conclusion, it being assumed that the Lords are unalterable, and that it is unconstitutional to make even a partial change in the composition of that House in order to bring it into correspondence with the total change that the House of Commons undergoes at a General Election. Lord Hugh Cecil argues in the "Times" that it was wrong to call on the King to create peers even in 1832, in face of the Bristol riots. But, in fact, this function of the Crown represents one of its really practical, and indeed indispensable, offices. Let us grant that we maintain the Monarchy for ornament as well as for use. Nevertheless, the Crown sets the whole constitutional machinery going, and keeps it going. The Monarch acts through his Ministers, offering a permanent guarantee that they, in turn, shall govern constitutionally through a majority in the House of Commons. In order to secure this purpose still more thoroughly, he has let his own Veto fall into disuse, so that it may not interfere with the clear association of the acts of the Ministry with the popular will expressed through the people's representatives. The Crown therefore acts in consonance with the general development of democratic feeling and of Parliamentary institutions. It keeps clear of the implication that its personal interests, as the leader of "Society" or the landowning interest, make it difficult for it to "transact with" Liberalism or Laborism, as Pio Nono once declared it to be impossible for the Papacy to "transact" with modern progress. If the nation preferred Mr. Keir Hardie to Mr. Asquith or Mr. Balfour, and gave him the power to form a government, we all know that the King would receive him with just the same courtesy as he would extend to either of those statesmen. But we know equally well that the Lords, acting in no national interest whatever, but merely for their ground rents, have flatly declined to deal even with average Liberalism, and are in open insurrection against the party system as men so moderate as Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Haldane interpret it. They are, in a word, in a state of rebellion against modern Government, and if a file of guards is not to be ordered into the Central Hall of Westminster Palace, and the doors of the Gilded Chamber shut against all peers attempting to enter it, the expedient of enlarging the membership of the House through the action of the Crown alone remains to us. It is a regular and not a large extension of the powers of the Crown that, when the popular will is continually and permanently thwarted, as it has been thwarted since 1906, the Sovereign should intervene to carry it into law. The medium of such action is, of course, the advice of the King's Ministers, which, according to Bagehot, in itself represents, in this case of the creation of peers, a substantial constitutional authority.

The Liberal Party therefore appeals directly to the Crown, and says, with respect, that it is its duty and right and power to act on the verdict of 1910, when that verdict has been clearly embodied in proceedings and Acts of the House of Commons. What is the Crown in a country like our own? It lives by and for the people. The future of the monarchy is absolutely bound up with democracy. The more conservative forces in the country will always support it; our "Crowned Republic" rests on the fact that even if some classes regard the monarchy as a stand-by for privilege and property, the masses also accept it as a guarantee that their liberties are to hold, and that progress to further franchises is not to be barred. No King has tasted the fruits of this popular attachment to the Throne more freely than Edward the Seventh, or has labored more steadily to enjoy and deserve them and to hand them on to his successor. But if we appeal to the Crown, we also appeal to the people. We are approaching a critical hour; the peers are immovable, the menace to democracy remains in its full force, and the attitude of men like Lord Hugh Cecil shows that the most reactionary doctrine will be used to sustain it. Renewed and powerful agitation should at once be set on foot all over the country; based on the claim for a settlement of the conflict with the House of Lords in a sense favorable to popular government.

THE POSITION CLEARED.

THE position of the Government and party has been satisfactorily cleared by the statements of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday. Grave difficulties and some uncertainties remain ahead, but for the present the ground is clear, the proposals of the Government are known, and there is no doubt as to the immediate line of advance. The points that have been in controversy since the close of the Elections have, in fact, been resolved in favor of the fighting policy on which the bulk of the party was firmly resolved. The governing consideration was the nature of the solution to be proposed for the constitutional difficulty. Here there could be no doubt at all, after the expressions of opinion last week, that the party was determined to adhere to the policy of limiting the Veto, decided on after full deliberation by the Government of 1907. Everyone is aware that this limitation is not the last word on the constitutional question, and there is, accordingly, no objection to the submission of later and separate schemes of reconstruction for deliberate consideration. The overwhelming opinion of the party, however, was, as we contended, that the existing power of the Veto must be broken before these complex schemes of reconstruction, which cause so much division of opinion, could profitably be taken up. It was, moreover, abundantly clear that, if any alteration of policy were needed, the time for it was before, and not immediately after, a general election in which that policy had been the leading issue. Any change of front would unavoidably have been interpreted as a weakening of principle. For the immediate future, however, there is now, fortunately, no doubt. The constructive suggestions of the Government will be viewed with a certain intellectual interest. But the operative resolutions on which we shall fight will be those dealing with the financial and the legislative Veto.

Until this preliminary point was settled, the action of the Government and the party alike was paralysed. Both, now that they are clear as to identity of aim, are free to take up the question of tactics, and here, again, two decisive points were settled on Monday. In the first place, as repeatedly urged in THE NATION, Mr. Asquith agreed to introduce the Veto resolutions into the House of Lords as well as into the House of Commons. We may assume that they will be rejected in the one place with a majority as decisive as that which will carry them in the other, and we have then the situation in which the ultimate question of constitutional authority may fairly be posed. It will then have to be asked whether there is no method, short of putting the country to all the turmoil of a second General Election, by which a few hundred irresponsible hereditary legislators who have for three years defied the representatives of the people, and who have for generations exercised their whole power uniformly on one side of politics, can be brought to accept a position which will still leave them great influence, but will no longer enable them to treat the King's Government with contempt. We shall have to test the means available for the purpose; but, meanwhile, we had on Monday, and this is our second point, Mr. Lloyd George's decisive pledge that the Government would make the possession of such powers a question on which it would stand or fall.

Thus the whole statement of the Albert Hall may be said to be re-asserted as the declared policy of the Liberal Government. The Veto is to be preferred to all other issues, awaiting only the adjustment of those practical necessities of Supply, without which the Government cannot be carried on. To the Veto the Government is pledged, and not merely to a Veto Bill, but to a Veto Limitation Act. Without the power necessary to transform the Bill into an Act, the Government will no longer go on. Not only so. It will be the last Liberal Government that will hold office until the power to obtain such an Act is available.

It is possible, though, as we argue elsewhere, not at all inevitable, that this means a General Election in the near future. Such a contest can be faced with equanimity, provided we remain, as we now have every hope of remaining, a united party, clear as to its aims and free from all suspicion of weakness on its avowed principles. As to our prospects of success, they will depend largely on two considerations. The first is the maintenance of the alliance between the British and Irish democracies; the second, closely intertwined with it, is the safe passage of the Budget into law. Mr. Redmond, who has been very justly laying great stress on the importance of co-operation between the democratic elements in the two islands, cannot do more to forward a firm understanding than by making his fellow countrymen appreciate the importance attached to the Budget on this side of St. George's Channel. The Budget is for Englishmen and Scotsmen the first effective weapon forged for the assault on the great land monopoly, and though the land clauses may look differently in Irish eyes, that is, in the main, because they are aimed, in effect, at the condition of urban life in Great Britain, while the Irish agrarian problem has been approached by British Liberals on other lines. The whisky duties to which the Irish object are of vastly less importance in Great Britain, and if interest attaches to their maintenance, it is mainly because any alteration in the Budget, however small, would be quoted as a justification of the action of the Lords. We can hardly doubt that the diplomatic abilities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be equal, under conditions such as these, to the task of arranging a compromise which will enable the Budget to become law. The result will be to avoid a discouragement and despondency on the popular side which might be fatal, and to relax the abnormal efforts on the part of property, liquor, and land which we witnessed in January last. For the moment, we trust that the democratic parties, having now a clear issue before them, will refrain, so far as human nature allows, from vain recriminations as to what was, or what might have been, last month, and will force themselves to the full recognition of the serious fact that the main battle on the greatest constitutional issue since 1832 still lies before them, that defeat means not only the indefinite postponement of social progress, but the triumph of a definite policy of Reaction, Protection, and Militarism.

SOME PROBLEMS OF MARRIAGE.

ALTHOUGH we fear that a Royal Commission is a clumsy instrument for solving the more delicate problems of humanity, it may serve, by throwing a searchlight upon dark spots in the social system, to educate public opinion towards certain urgent issues of reform. In this spirit we welcome the important inquiry into the Law of Divorce which a small, well-chosen group of men and women are now opening. We could have wished that the Commission had been strengthened by the appointment of at least one working woman in direct and intimate touch with the class and sex whose interests are most vitally affected by the admitted defects in the working of existing laws. Nor would it have been amiss to add one of those modern thinkers and observers who, in this question at any rate, can claim to be our most competent practical sociologists.

The main issues, as they open out in the inquiry, fall under two heads, that of the desirability of changes in our existing laws of Divorce and Separation, and that of reforms in administration, with the object of bringing existing remedies within the reach of the poorer classes. Under the first head there is very little in the shape of admitted facts to go upon. We are, for the most part, in the region of private opinion, and that upon a subject peculiarly exposed to personal prejudice and passion. It is, however, satisfactory to recognise a pretty close agreement among judicial and other official witnesses in favor of an extension of divorce to cases of permanent lunacy, habitual drunkenness, and long terms of penal servitude. On the question of still further relaxation of the divorce law, and its equal application to the two sexes, the widest divergencies of opinion are displayed. Upon one day the Commission was engaged with Sir John Bigham, who doubts the gain of any extension of divorce, and defends the inequality in facilities for divorce as between the sexes by the doctrine of the "accidental slip," and Sir George Lewis, who favors absolute equality for the sexes, and an inclusion of cruelty and desertion as separate sufficient grounds for divorce. The judgment expressed by Sir George, as the result of more than half a century's experience, that "adultery simply and solely should be a ground for divorce for either party," though not commanding the assent of all the witnesses, will, we think, commend itself as obviously reasonable to the great majority of fair-minded people.

We are aware that many persons honestly believe that any relaxation of the marriage laws must mean the weakening of moral obligations. Sir Benjamin Deane, for example, expressed this view in the following amazing utterance: "In the old days before the divorce law, people did not marry without the most careful consideration, and, when married, they settled down to the life. Now people marry too early, without due care as to whether they are suited to each other, and under the feeling that they can get rid of each other easily if so disposed." It would, we hold, be difficult to find any support for the assertions of fact or of opinion conveyed in this answer. If the arrangements of the Commission are so ordered as to admit the summoning of witnesses representing all grades of our society, we imagine that the Commissioners will be impressed by the strength of opinion in favor of a relaxation of divorce in certain directions as an aid to social morality.

On the other main issue, the cheapening and easing of the operation of the existing law, there is an agreement on the grievance, but a stubborn diversity of opinion as to remedies. Divorce is at present admittedly a privilege of the well-to-do. The costs of an action in the High Court place it entirely outside the reach of the working-classes. So far as the vast majority of the nation is concerned, the law is therefore inoperative. The partial relief afforded by the law of 1896, granting judicial separations, undeniably leads to immorality, and in some quarters to a wide prevalence of illegitimacy. Mr. Tijou, High Bailiff to the West Ham County Court, startled the Commission by attributing to the present difficulty of divorce a large measure of responsibility for the increase of illegitimacy and the neglect of children in the poorest parts of East London. But while the evil of withholding facilities of divorce from the workers is generally admitted, official opinion differs as to methods of redress. County Court judges and registrars plead for the County Court as the proper instrument of administration, and Sir George Lewis would extend the jurisdiction to local stipendiary magistrates. Others prefer to retain the jurisdiction within the High Court and would be prepared, either to try divorce cases at Assizes, or to empower local judicial authorities to take depositions on behalf of the High Court so as to keep down the expenses of a trial. Difficulties bristle in either path. The maintenance of a sole Court in London, or the mere supplement of Assizes, would do little to meet the case of the poorer working classes, and the expenses of a defended suit in a County Court would, for most people, prove an impassable barrier. Moreover, in the administration of a law where so much discretion must be vested in the judge in the interpretation of elastic terms like cruelty, it seems possible that the fifty-five County Courts might evolve widely divergent standards of divorce, producing on a smaller scale some of the evils rampant in the United States. Might it not prove more practicable to allow a reasonable discretion to magistrates granting judicial separations to expand a separation order into a complete divorce, subject to an assent of the High Court to a case stated by the magistrate? Unless some such simple method can be safely adopted, the unequal administration of the divorce law hardly seems capable of effective redress.

The urgency of this redress can only be realised by those familiar with the detailed circumstances, economic and moral, of the life of the poorer grades of workers in our cities. The depths of misery and degradation due to the compulsory maintenance of hopelessly disastrous unions upon the one hand, and to the economic and moral helplessness of deserted women with dependent families upon the other, have not yet been fully probed by the Commission. When they are, the utter triviality of most of the solemn official "remedies" will be obvious. We are much mistaken if the Commission, provided it pursues its inquiry deep enough, will not disclose roots of the marriage problem which drive far deeper into the social soil than is yet revealed by the official evidence.

IRELAND'S INTEREST IN THE BUDGET.

IF the Government has successfully solved its other tactical problems, that of the Budget remains. Probably a little suspense—though delay is costly—may be desirable. The Budget is not known in Ireland as it is known in England, Wales, and Scotland. The Budget League and the Free Trade Union both left Ireland out of their campaign. In Ulster and many of the Irish towns the merits of the Budget are recognised, and a feeling of fraternity with our trade unionists exists. But distillers and publicans there are at least as powerful politically as brewers and publicans on this side of the Irish Sea, and just as strongly anti-Budget. Their hostility, however, is mainly directed to the spirit duties. The licence duties are a minor matter. A wave of temperance has been passing over Ireland. The consumption of whisky has been much reduced, and the new whisky duties get the whole credit of the change, though they only deserve a modest share. One small and rather bad tax (the stamp duties on land transfer) has also caused trouble; for the transfer of land is a chief occupation in Ireland, in consequence of the Land Act. But the total yield is a mere trifle.

But the case for the Budget in Ireland is far stronger even than in Scotland and England, because the benefits on the expenditure side are, proportionately, so much greater. It is officially estimated that all the new taxes will only draw half a million from Ireland, whereas the new expenditure on Irish Old Age Pensioners alone is nearly $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions, to which another £350,000 annually would be added by the removal of the pauper disqualification. Altogether, including land and education and Universities, Ireland secures well over three millions in return for £500,000—i.e., £6 for every £1 subscribed. The sum is startling and significant. It proves conclusively, if further proof were needed, that this is a Poor Man's Budget, and that Mr. William O'Brien is the rich man's advocate. The Irish rich man has to pay more, in exactly the same proportion as wealthy Scots and Englishmen. And he cries out and complains, quite like the English Duke (but through the mouth of Mr. O'Brien) about "the robbery and plunder of Ireland." The assurance of the Factionists on Irish platforms is, indeed, astounding. Mr. Maurice Healy has been declaring in Cork that the Budget costs Ireland two millions, when the truth is that Ireland gains a clear advantage of two millions and a-half.

The alternative to the Budget is, of course, to go on borrowing, and to drop the removal of the pauper disqualification. This alternative is wasteful of public money and credit, as well as lowering to the political prestige of the Government. If adopted, it will certainly prejudice the constitutional advice which the Prime Minister will, in due course, tender to the King. For the natural answer will be: "How can you claim to have a majority of the House of Commons in the full sense if you cannot pass the Budget; and if you cannot pass the Budget, how can you demand the absolute removal of that Veto on finance which was the cause of the late crisis and dissolution?" But for Ireland the alternative is obviously much worse than for England. In the first place, without the Budget Ireland is paying a much higher proportion of the revenue than she will pay after the Budget is passed. In the second place, she will suffer far more than any other part of the Kingdom through failure to remove the pauper disqualification. And, in the third place, the factor of high credit, which matters comparatively little to us, is almost vital to Ireland, because it is on behalf of Ireland that British credit is being every year employed to the tune of five millions sterling. The "Cork Examiner," in a very thoughtful article last Monday, argues that if the figures were known, "many persons who have expressed strong antagonism to Mr. Lloyd George's Budget would modify their views considerably," and the same point is urged with equal force by Mr. Diamond in the "Freeman's Journal." How, asks our Irish contemporary, could the rejection of the Budget improve the chances of Home Rule? But if the answer be that Home Rule will not be forwarded, but retarded, then the Budget may be considered on its merits. "A very large number of people in this country," continues the "Cork Examiner," "are desirous that the promised pauper disqualification (which at present prevents about £350,000 additional being distributed in Old Age Pensions in Ireland) should be abolished; and how can this be accomplished if the Irish Party rejects the Budget which provides the cash? It is clear that we cannot have it both ways; and if a surtax on large incomes and increased estate duties impose burdens on the rich (which is the Liberal programme), the wealthy may have grounds to grumble, but the poor benefit."

We need not dwell further upon this shrewd Irish comment. The figures are overwhelming. Ireland pays about £535,000; Ireland stands to gain about £3,254,000. On the taxation side of the account we have the following official estimates:—

Tobacco duties	180,000
Income tax	100,000
Spirit duties	80,000
Liquor licences	60,000
Estate duties	52,000
Urban land taxes	24,000
Petrol duties and motor licences...	22,000
Stamps	17,000

Total Irish contribution... 535,000

On the other side of the account are the sums spent in Ireland:—

Present Pensions	2,460,000
Qualification of Paupers ...	350,000
Education and Land Services ...	400,000
Labor Exchanges (say)	10,000
Roads	22,000
Relief of Rates in towns... ..	12,000

£3,254,000

Thus—to adopt the picturesque imagery of Mr. Seddon—we may see in this Budget a stream of sovereigns running in the shape of Irish taxes to England, and another stream in the shape of English expenditure in Ireland flowing back to Dublin. But the second stream is six times the volume of the first. For every sovereign that Mr. Lloyd George takes from Ireland he gives six back.

CHINA IN MOTION.

THE happenings of the past month in Thibet have inevitably been regarded by most of us primarily as a chapter in the history of a mysterious theocracy. That certainly is their dramatic, their human, aspect. For some centuries, until Lord Curzon cast his eyes upon her, Thibet had had no history. One Dalai Lama after another had satisfactorily materialised the soul of Buddha in its infant body. Each Dalai Lama in his turn had ceased to sin by living, towards the age of eighteen—an amiable habit that confirmed the priests who surrounded him in their faith in a Providence which left them perpetually the trustees and ministers of a minor. The sleepy round which consisted in the immaculate birth and more guilty death of Dalai Lamas was suddenly broken by one barbarian invasion, only to be followed by a permanent Chinese occupation. Twice in five years the Incarnation of Buddha has fled from Lhasa—an accident to which, it may be, he owes his preservation from the more humdrum and domestic perils which commonly menace his life at or about the age when he would normally aspire to rule. To-day he is at Darjeeling, a fugitive under the flag which was the first to invade his Alpine hermitage. One thinks of the episode as one thinks of the Babylonian captivity, of the papacy at Avignon, or of the flight of Pio Nono to Naples during the brief episode of the Roman Republic. What manner of man he is, this Chinese Amban who has seized the sacred city—a Constable de Bourbon, or a minor Napoleon—we do not know. The chances are that he is merely a commonplace Chinese official with the normal Celestial contempt for tributary peoples, backed in this instance by a faith in the efficacy of rifles and discipline against gingals and anarchy. The development of the tragedy cannot fail to be interesting. There are factions among the Thibetans themselves. The Chinese appear to think that they can conjure the incarnation of Buddha from the Dalai Lama's body, as easily as they can strip one of their own officials of his yellow jacket. Russia, orthodox even in the disputes of other creeds, has come forward to champion the fugitive Pontiff in the name of her own Buddhist subjects. Our own voice, more deliberate, more secret, has yet to be heard at Peking. There are those who would like to see a Buddhist Pope comfortably settled in a British Avignon this side of the Himalayas. There are others, less imaginative, who would prefer to see the fugitive back again in his impenetrable sanctuary.

The less dramatic aspect of this frontier tragedy is, perhaps, the more interesting. The Thibetans are a proper subject for curiosity and romance. But the Chinese must be taken more seriously. If the Thibetans have suffered, it is the Chinese who have acted. That, after all, is something of a portent, to be classed with the speaking ox in Livy. After centuries of immobility, amid which the tradition of conquest and expansion had utterly decayed, China appears as an aggressive Imperialist force. One can only guess at her motive for asserting the reality of her suzerainty over Thibet. The chances are that it was a calculation much like Lord Curzon's. East and West, Peking and Simla, reason on closely parallel lines, when they conceive themselves to be faced with a problem in self-preservation. Thibet is the mountain-wall of China as well as of India, and the Chinese presumably argued that they could use it as a barrier against Russia only by making their occupation effective. Whether they waited, as Lord Curzon did, to entrap the Dalai Lama in any fresh coquettings with St. Petersburg we do not know. The chances are that they were asserting themselves in one direction chiefly because they had met with a check in another. The Japanese, in recent months, have riveted their ascendancy yet more firmly upon Manchuria. The Chinese, apprehensive and wounded in their pride, turned to a quarter where, as yet, their claim of right is not disputed. That has invariably been the mechanics of all movement in the East. From the first irruption of the nations down to the immigrations of the Turks and Tartars, it has been some pressure from the further East which has sent the Oriental moving towards the West. In its way, this fresh development is a crude proof of returning vitality. It is rarely in a spiritual advance that a new flood of national life first shows itself. The easiest form of self-assertion is always in some claim to territory, some desperate effort to snatch a vanishing right. The Young Turks have become sensitive about Crete long before they have succeeded in putting their own house in order. The Chinese reassert their claim to Thibet, while the whole problem of their internal reorganisation remains in suspense. So it is, alike in China and in Turkey, that the army is the first department of the sphere of government to transform itself, partially indeed, yet with a certain success, according to European models.

The fragmentary news which reaches us in this country from China has suggested, as one reads it piecemeal, an undecided and unintelligible struggle between reaction and reform. The largest projects are launched, only to be overthrown by some Palace intrigue among the Manchus, the ladies of the Court, and the eunuchs. On a closer view, the course of events lends itself to a much more hopeful reading than that. The reaction can triumph in the Palace, but it invariably succumbs to the inevitable movement of the times. There was a moment of extravagant hope when the late Emperor, under the guidance of the revolutionary philosopher, Kang-yu-Wei, was in process of transforming the heavens and the earth by a series of radical decrees. Menaced by the Dowager-Empress, he summoned the reputed reformer, Yuan-Shih-Kai, to back him in Peking with his German-drilled troops. The reformer came, only to sell himself to the formidable old lady of the reaction. Very slowly, and by easy stages, the apparent traitor rose to power, and as he rose he made the Dowager-Empress herself, in spite of the Boxer movement, an instrument in the policy of reform. The curse of opium was combated, the bureaucracy transformed, education was advanced, the army re-organised, commissioners for the study of Western institutions sent abroad, the local administration in several provinces reformed, and the whole Civil Service permeated by young officials, largely Cantonese, who had studied in Japanese or European colleges. Then came the edict promising the gradual establishment of a Constitution within ten years. Once more the advance was broken. Yuan-Shih-Kai was dismissed and disgraced, and it seemed that the influence of the more reactionary Manchus was once more in the ascendant. But the elected provincial councils none the less met last October. They debated with dignity and good sense; they asserted their independence with success against the officials who menaced it; they strengthened their position by asking only for reforms which are concrete and practical.

The inference from these facts is fairly clear. The movement for reform is now too broad and too popular to be at the mercy of personal accidents. The chances are that the few Chinese personalities whose names we happen to know are really much less important than we are apt to suppose. They reign in our minds in vacuo; in China they are two or three among hundreds of millions. The transformation of the central government will probably be the last stage in a long evolution. What is vital and important is that, in the provinces and the cities, here faster and there slower, the work of reconstruction does go busily forward. The certainty of a revival is not in doubt. What is doubtful is only how far the quicker motions and assured position of Japan will enable her to dominate the heart of China, as she has dominated Korea and South Manchuria. It is in its bearing on this problem that this odd, spasmodic act of self-assertion in Thibet gains significance. It may, when we know more of it, turn out to be a move actually inspired by the same Japanese influence which brought about the fall of the too-nationalist Yuan-Shih-Kai. It may, on the other hand, be a spontaneous act of calculating and far-seeing self-defence. If it is the latter, then at last, even though it be with uncertain steps, China has begun to walk by herself.

PLUCKED FROM THE PIT.

THE Liberal Party has this week plucked its leaders from the pit into which they had nearly fallen, and has set their feet in the path in which they should go. In this task it has had three powerful allies. The first was Irish Nationalism, the second was the Labor Party, and the third was Mr. Redmond's gifts as a Parliamentarian and his power to represent a cause left temporarily derelict by its natural leaders. But Liberalism has done something on its own account. The effect of the election on both sides has been the same; it has emphasised, italicised, the party creed. The Tories have come back Tariff Reformers almost to a man; the Liberals, fresh from fighting a revolutionary issue, in which the new democracy drew strength from the old Liberal feeling about representative government, have reappeared as an almost solid army of Radicalism. Moreover, this body has none of the malaise which besets a host fresh from a doubtful encounter. Wealth may have trampled down Free Trade in Southern England; but this is no discouragement to a Liberal Parliamentary party hailing from an almost solid North, where organised labor and the stern and bitter feeling about the Lords have swept kingdoms and counties that usually consider themselves predominant forces in democratic politics. Add the fact that the new Liberal-Radical Party contains a larger infusion of young men than its predecessor, and one perceives the driving power that brought about the Cromwellian parleys of the rank and file with the Liberal leaders during this week and last. These parleys have had the desired result. The party has been brought to the fighting point; timidities and pruderies have been roughly swept away—and the flag goes forward.

This change of front and demeanor in Parliamentary Liberalism has had an unfortunate effect on the Opposition. Like the Radicals, the Tory Party returned from the election with a song of victory on its lips. Beyond its personal view of Mr. Lloyd George as a Monster, it had one definite political idea—Protection. The debate on the Chamberlain amendment may have been a revelation to some of its members of the power and intellectual superiority of the Free Trade argument; but Mr. Balfour, as a giant in the things of the mind, was confidently expected to put matters right. That great leader, however, had formed a different conception of the situation, and of the part which he desired to play in it. Mr. Balfour may really possess an intellectual conscience, or we may suppose that the prospect of office gave an unpleasant look to the gaudy lures which he had spread for the electors. In any case, he decided to dispense with these attractions, and during his speech the familiar Protectionist formulæ—"Work for All," "The Foreigner Pays," "Your Food will Cost you Less"—gradually melted away into the metaphysical mist. This was discouraging, but worse remained behind. Mr. Balfour had probably formed two fairly precise ideas of the situation. He has had enough of Revolution, and he wanted to get the Budget out of the way. And he was in no mind to be suddenly called to power after a refusal of Supplies to the Government. In the first instance, he must have seen himself summoned in hot haste to a task for which he was both unfit and unprepared. In the second, he recognised a sure means of hurling him on to the electorate with the smallest possible chance of a friendly reception. If he refused Supplies to the Liberals, the Liberals would naturally refuse Supplies to him.

Beyond all this, a fascinating vista seemed likely to open to an ingenious mind in the prospect that the Government, forgetting its plain engagements of honor and obligations of policy, was going to "reform" the House of Lords instead of destroying its Veto. Here, then, was a game in which Mr. Balfour's speculative fancy would have found rich employment between this and Christmas. And he would not have played it alone. Lord Hugh Cecil has already made his seat on the front bench below the gangway a new fortification of the Balfourian spirit. Cecil answering to Cecil, these ingenuous critics would have made excellent sport of a betrayed and distracted party, while the Order Book was piled high with amendments till Pelion heaped itself on Ossa. Such an amusement presented, as its sure reward, the total extinction of Radicalism, privilege saved, the Budget and its fruits scattered to the winds, and Mr. Balfour himself, temporarily delivered from the fear of his enemies on both sides of the House, given a bumping majority, to be played with and destroyed in its turn.

How far this Balfourian paradise had advanced in its author's imagination it is impossible to say; but events have given it a rude shock. The Prime Minister's speech on Monday, backed by Mr. Lloyd George's incisive and expansive commentary, saved the situation for his party, just as last week's announcement all but ruined it. But when Mr. Balfour rose to reply, he spoke as if nothing was changed. He assumed a still hostile Irish party, bent on refusing Supply. If this state of mind persisted, he knew that, if he would risk office, gained through the Irish-Tory coalition already offered him by Mr. O'Brien, he could have it. But he shrank back. For what gain could so sceptical a spirit divine in a perilous deal with Nationalism on a scheme of Protection, not one fact or element of which had been thought out, and through the mazes of which his vague, unpractical intelligence would have groped in vain? Far better wait and trust to the growing confusions of the hour, the signs of alienation between Liberalism and the Cabinet. As it happened, he might have played the bold game with safety. The faithful warnings of the Liberal Parliamentary Party on the primacy of the Veto question, and Mr. Redmond's clear presentment of the tactical issue, had done their work, and the ship's course was turned in the right direction. But the official Tories could not overcome the fears of turning out the Government which had made their Whips watch with fevered eyes the lobby movements of the Irishmen. The story went about that a familiar humorist had playfully led a small body of his countrymen in the direction of the Opposition lobby, in order to enjoy the undisguised torture of Sir Alexander Acland Hood and his colleagues. Mindful of these alarms, the Tory leader played for safety. The Government should have their Supply. True, they would not pass the "People's Budget," and they were actually proposing to kill the House of Lords first and then to reform it. But these were the eccentricities of Radical strategy, not to be measured with the pressing needs of the hour. This care for constitutional decorum was expanded a little later on by Lord Hugh Cecil and other Conservative critics into a suggestion that the Commons should revert to their earlier practice of a Bill for every tax, and undoing the bundle of faggots which Gladstone tied up for them in 1861, present for the separate approval of their Lordships such imposts as the Tory minority in the Commons approved.

But Mr. Balfour's strategy found small favor with the Protectionists behind him. They saw power slipping from their leader's listless grasp, and the Government once more in command of the electoral situation. Bitterly did they resent his weakness. Mr. Healy's taunts, crude as they were, stung them deeply, and the reproaches of the "Morning Post" reflected their wrath. But, in reality, it mattered little what Mr. Balfour did or did not do with the Government's demand for the passage of Supply. The Coalition has been practically rallied again to the policy of "Veto First," which was its only reason for existence, the pith and meaning of all the success that the elections had brought it. It is still an unsolved mystery of politics why a Government full of able men should have so lost sight of, and touch with, its following; why, when, speed and unity were essential, delay and dissension should have so prevailed; why, when the direction was so plain that a wayfaring man need not err therein, a set of hieroglyphics should have been proposed for the Liberal Party to decipher; why, when the Government was told to build up the House of Commons and to put down the House of Lords, nearly half the Cabinet—in the heat and din of a most dangerous Parliamentary situation—should have calmly set about the construction of a Senate.

Life and Letters.

THE SOVRANTY OF "SOCIETY."

How is it that while a working-class audience becomes wild with indignation when one of its chosen leaders dares to dwell upon its foibles or its vices, Society smiles complacently at every exposure of its folly, every reprobation of its wickedness? It has always done so. "Vanity Fair" and "The Newcomes" aroused no resentment, they were the favorite reading of the very people whom their satire was designed to flay. The more vehement denunciation of a recreant aristocracy and a vulgar new plutocracy by Carlyle and Ruskin, Matthew Arnold's taunts at the "barbarian" class, were treated by the objects of attack with the same amused interest as the present-day tirades of a Father Vaughan, or the mock revolutionism of Mr. Bernard Shaw. None of these things move them. Nay, one may go further, and say that Society thrives on such abuse. Denounce the idleness, frivolity, vice, luxury, display of "high life," its denizens, if they condescended to reply, would say, "Yes, this is the way we live; we can afford to do it. Don't you wish you could? In your secret souls you all admire us for it." It is the half-conscious recognition of the validity of this retort that makes all these linguistic assaults upon the fortress of Society so utterly innocuous. Those inside know very well how amenable are their fiercest critics to well-chosen social influences. It could hardly be otherwise. For, though "Society" forms but a minute fraction of our national life, its moral influence is pervasive, a very atmosphere in which we all live, move, and have our being. For though we may be born and reside in a distinctly inferior grade, we look for our rules of respectability in most matters of behavior, dress, bearing, habits, and interests, to the grade next above us, and they, in their turn, look up, and so it comes to pass that the "form," "style," "fashions" of the glorious beings at the top percolate through the social fabric and are imposed upon us in due course at our lower level.

Nowhere does authority achieve such absolute finality as in the unanswerable phrase, "Madam, it is not worn." Society rules by this moral prestige. To ask how it has acquired the sway is to ask for a complete history of modern England. No doubt the breakdown of fixed status, especially in the aristocracy, had much to do with its extension. A too exclusive aristocracy cannot radiate such power, for where there is no hope of entrance the prestige is one of impotent admiration, not of imitation. But the chief cause of the operation of the power is the full evolution of a great and highly stratified middle-class moving upward by hardly sensible gradation into aristocracy, and stooping in its lower reaches to meet the upper grades of the skilled and well-paid workers. Given this elaborate social-economic structure, the product of the industrial changes of the last century and a half, we have the prime condition of a moral control of Society, far more powerful, various, and pervasive than has been exercised in any other nation at any other age. This theme is handled ably and with profound insight by Mr. H. E. M. Stutfield in a work of realistic sociology, "The Sovranty of Society" (Fisher Unwin).

His treatment is the more effective because the writer is a Conservative in politics, and his diagnosis, though keen and even ruthless, is highly discriminative. He dwells little on the graver scandals and vices which stand in the limelight. He does not find "Society" particularly wicked. Indeed, our "Society" as compared with that of Imperial Rome, or medieval Florence, or eighteenth-century Paris, or even London under the Georges, is a cradle of innocence. There are not nearly so many black sheep, nor are they so black. Even the coarse brutalities and the mad recklessness which marked English "Society" in the eighteenth century, the drunkenness, gaming, and brawling, are no longer the accepted attributes of an English gentleman. The extravagances which mark our Society are less audacious, milder, and more consistently foolish. The life, though equally destitute of principle or purpose, is less full-blooded and virile. The words which best express that life are sport, dissipation, frivolity, insipidity, triviality. It is, indeed, this last word which Mr. Stutfield rightly chooses to summarise the characteristic features of "Society." Wherever Society lays hands on any occupation or practice, it trivialises it. And Society does directly, and not by subservient imitation only, interfere with so many of our institutions. It must do so, for it has to mould the character of the "Society" man or woman, to furnish them scope for "social" activities, and to secure supports for "the existing order of things," of which Society is the decorative frieze. So the hand of frivolity is laid upon our public schools to teach boys to be little "sportsmen," and little "gentlemen," in the first place, scholars afterwards, if at all. In all save an indomitable few, the seeds of free curiosity and love of knowledge are destroyed, or their young shoots are carefully grafted on to some older stock of reputable learning. As Professor Veblen has shown in his "Theory of the Leisure Class," all intellectual or cultural valuations are vitiated and reversed by the canons of social reputation, which give importance to studies in inverse ratio to the utility which they contain.

Nor does religion fare much better. As a subsidiary instrument of Society, the modern Church not merely serves the ceremonial and sedative purposes for which it was primarily designed, but it blossoms out into a mass of light weekday functions destitute of any serious purpose, and, in the main, thin cloaks for frivolity. Or, again, if we ask what is wrong with our art, our graver literature or drama, why any worthy practice of these great creative arts is well-nigh impossible, we are met by the same inevitable answer. Society, that sets the tone, does not want serious art and literature; they bore it, and it recognises in them a deep-rooted hostility to itself. It belongs to frivolity, indeed, to be wayward and inconsistent: it plays pranks with its own nerves. So it will let in, and even sanction with some brief stamp of fashion, some dangerous play of Mr. Galsworthy. But no great realistic work of wide and shaking purpose could have a run; the self-protective instinct of Society, operating through its press, its pulpit, its ubiquitous buzz of drawing-rooms, would soon stifle it.

But Society enjoys special spheres of influence. The Army, the diplomatic service, and the Foreign Office have always belonged to it, and through them Society has pulled innumerable strings. It is just here that the crux of Army reform is found. How shall an Army which is primarily, not a profession, or a means of livelihood, but a "social function," get itself reformed into "efficiency"? Mr. Stutfield thinks that the illuminating confession that in the Army "It is bad form to be keen" is no longer true, and that a genuine spirit of reformation has set in. But we doubt its lasting character, or its power so easily to extricate itself from the blight of sport and frivolity.

More indirect, more insidious, and, perhaps, more dangerous is the grip of Society over politics. It is one thing to have an open formal oligarchy, as was the case half a century ago, quite another to have a formal democracy with the real strings of government pulled from a few drawing-rooms in Mayfair, or by rich financiers who buy their right to call or block a public policy by subscriptions to the party fund. Mr. Stutfield's caustic summary, though certainly not new, is deeply significant. "The Mandarins of the Front Bench on either side thoroughly understand each other; they abuse one another in public, but they are often in reality excellent friends, for, as they spring from the same classes, there is a bond of social union between them. You may nowadays have bitter political opponents calling one another, outside the House, by their Christian names; their families intermarry, and a high Tory will sometimes act as best man at a Radical politician's wedding. Their virulent polemics, their furious logomachies across the floor of the House, are largely make-believe; and the week-end may find them shooting, golfing, or dining together, just as though no political bar sundered them."

"Yes," it will be replied in one of those very phrases which Society has imposed for its protection, "it is this absence of personal ill-feeling that is so admirable in our public life." Just so long as this answer sounds satisfactory, will it remain true that private considerations (a synonym for Society) determine public policy. Nor is it in Parliament alone that social influences rule. Everyone acquainted with the workings of party politics is aware that the bestowal of "titles" is only the most patent of the workings of the "social spoils" system which operates down to the most trifling use of invitations through every grade of popular life.

One other avenue of this "sovranty" requires mention. From Society emanates the same taint of frivolity into our business life. Capable men are passed over in the control of our great businesses in favor of rich men. In some cases, notoriously our railroad system, the appointment of untrained and incompetent directors for their name and influence has done immeasurable damage. But the directorates of many other sorts of business suffer from the same inefficiency, at a time when other countries are selecting and training their best brains in order to keep abreast of new inventions and new modes of enterprise.

How comes it that Society can exercise this baleful and multifarious power, can impose the maxims that it is bad "form" to be keen, or to exhibit strong feelings, to value steady industry, and to have serious interests in life? Perhaps this important question would be fully answered if we could explain to ourselves how the colossal act of impudence is possible by which the name "Society" has, with the connivance of all users of our language, been usurped by a tiny section whose power and practices, nay, whose very existence, are anti-social.

"WHERE CRUEL RAGE."

"FRET not thyself," sang the cheerful Psalmist—"fret not thyself because of evildoers." For they shall soon be cut down like the grass; they shall be rooted out; their sword shall go through their own heart; their arms shall be broken; they shall consume as the fat of lambs, and as the smoke they shall consume away; though they flourish like a green bay-tree, they shall be gone, and though we seek them, their place shall nowhere be found. A soothing consolation lies in the thought. Why should we fluster ourselves, why wax so hot, when time thus brings its inevitable revenges? Composed in mind, let us pursue our own unruffled course, with calm assurance that justice will at length prevail. Let us comply with the dictates of sweetness and light, in reasonable expectation that iniquity will melt away of itself, like a snail before the fire. If we have confidence that vengeance is the Lord's and He will repay, where shall we find an outlet for our indignation so secure?

It was the pious answer made by Dr. Delany to Swift at the time when, torn by cruel rage, Swift was entering upon the struggle against Ireland's misery. Swift appealed to him one day "whether the corruptions and villainies of men in power did not eat his flesh and exhaust his spirits?" But Delany answered, "That in truth they did not." "Why—why, how can you help it? How can you avoid it?" asked the indignant heart. And the judicious answer came: "Because I am commanded to the contrary; 'Fret not thyself because of the ungodly.'" We are grateful to be reminded of so characteristic a scene by Miss Sophie Shilleto Smith, who has written for Messrs. Methuen a new account of the Dean's life, with sympathy and knowledge, though with an immature sententiousness and uncertainty of judgment that one hopes are but the defects of youth's incalculable advantages. We call the scene characteristic because, under the qualities that it reveals in Swift and Delany, it also reveals a deeply marked distinction between two orders of mankind, and the two speakers stand as their types. Dr. Delany we all know. He may be met in any agreeable society—himself agreeable and tolerant, unwilling to judge lest he be judged, solicitous to please, careful not to lose esteem, always welcome among his numerous acquaintances, sweetly reasonable, and devoutly confident that the tale of hideous wrong will right itself without his stir. No figure is more essential for social intercourse, or moves round the cultivated or political circle of his life with more serene success.

To the great comfort of cultivated and political circles, the type of Swift is not so frequent or so comprehensible. What place have those who fret not themselves because of evildoers—what place in their tolerant society have they for uncouth personalities, terrible in their indignation? It is true that Swift was himself accounted a valued friend among the best wits and writers of his time. Bolingbroke wrote to him: "I loved you almost twenty years ago; I thought of you as well as I do now, better was beyond the power of conception." Pope, also after twenty years of intimate friendship, could write of him: "My sincere love of that valuable, indeed incomparable, man will accompany him through life, and pursue his memory were I to live a hundred lives." Arbuthnot could write to him:—

"DEAR FRIEND,—The last sentence of your letter plunged a dagger in my heart. Never repeat those sad, but tender, words, that you will try to forget me. For my part, I can never forget you—at least till I discover, which is impossible, another friend whose conversation could procure me the pleasure I have found in yours."

The friends of Swift—the men who could write like this—men like Bolingbroke, Pope, Arbuthnot, Addison, Steele, and Gay—were no sentimentalists; they rank among the shrewdest and most clear-eyed writers of our literature. And, indeed, to the present writer at all events, the difficulty of Swift's riddle lies, not in his savagery, but in his charm. When we think of that tiger burning in the forests of the night, how shall we reconcile his fearful symmetry with "eyes azure as the heavens," which Pope describes as having a surprising archness in them? Or when a man is reputed the most embittered misanthrope in history, how was it that his intimate friend, Sheridan, could speak of that "spirit of generosity and benevolence whose greatness and vigor, when pent up in his own breast by poverty and dependence, served only as an evil spirit to torment him"? Of his private generosity, and his consideration for the poor, for servants, and animals, there are many instances recorded. For divergent types of womanhood, whether passionate, witty, or intellectual, he possessed the attraction of sympathetic intimacy. A much younger woman of peculiar charm and noble character was his lifelong friend, risking reputation, marriage, position, and all that many women most value, just for that friendship and nothing more. Another woman loved him with more tragic destiny. To Stella, in the midst of his political warfare, he could write with the playfulness that nursemaids use for children, and most men keep for their kittens or puppies. In the "Verses on his own Death," how far removed from the envy, hatred, and malice of the literary nature is the affectionate irony of those verses beginning:—

"In Pope I cannot read a line,
But with a sigh I wish it mine;
When he can in one couplet fix
More sense than I can do in six,
It gives me such a jealous fit,
I cry, 'Plague take him and his wit.'
I grieve to be outdone by Gay
In my own humorous biting way;
Arbuthnot is no more my friend
Who dares to irony pretend,
Which I was born to introduce;
Refined it first, and showed its use."

And so on down to the lines:—

"If with such talents Heaven has blest 'em,
Have I not reason to detest 'em?"

To damn with faint praise is the readiest defence of envious failure; but to praise with jealous damnation reveals a delicate generosity that few would look for in the hater of his kind. Nor let us forget that Swift was himself the inventor of the phrase "Sweetness and light."

These elements of charm and generosity have been too much overlooked, and they could not redeem the writer's savagery in popular opinion, being overshadowed by that cruel indignation which ate his flesh and exhausted his spirit. Yet it was, perhaps, just from such elements of intuitive sympathy and affectionate goodwill that the indignation sprang. Like most oversensitive natures, he found that every new relation in life, even every new friendship that he formed, only opened a gate to new unhappiness. The sorrows of others were more to him than to themselves, and, like a man or woman that loves a child, he discovered that his affection only exposed a wider surface to pain. On the death of a lady with whom he was not very intimately acquainted, "I hate life," he cried, "when I think it exposed to such accidents: and to see so many thousand wretches burdening the earth while such as her die, makes me think God did never intend life for a blessing." It was not any spirit of hatred or cruelty, but an intensely personal sympathy with suffering, that tore his heart and kindled that furnace of indignation against the stupid, the hateful, and the cruel to whom most suffering is due; and it was a furnace in which he himself was consumed. Writing whilst he was still a youth, in "The Tale of a Tub," he composed a terrible sentence, in which all his rage and pity and ironical bareness of style seem foretold: "Last week," he says, "I saw a woman flayed, and you will hardly believe how much it altered her person for the worse." "Only a woman's hair," was found written on the packet in which that memorial of Stella was preserved, and we do not know in what elegy there breathes a prouder or more poignant sorrow.

When he wrote the Drapier Letters, Ireland lay before him like a woman flayed. Of the misery of Ireland it was said (we think by Sheridan):—

"It fevered his blood, it broke his rest, it drove him at times half frantic with furious indignation, it sunk him at times in abysses of sullen despondency, it awoke in him emotions which in ordinary men are seldom excited save by personal injuries."

This cruel rage over the wrongs of a people whom he did not love, and whom he repeatedly disowned, drove him to the savage denunciations in which he said of England's nominee: "It is no dishonor to submit to the lion, but who, with the figure of a man, can think with patience of being devoured alive by a rat?" It drove him also to the great principle, still too slowly struggling into recognition in this country, that "all government without the consent of the governed is the very definition of slavery." It inspired his "Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures," in which the advice to "burn everything that came from England except the coals and the people," might serve as the motto of the present Sinn Féin movement. And it inspired also that other "Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Ireland from being a burden to their Parents and Country, and making them beneficial to the Public. Fatten them up for the Dublin market; they will be delicious roast, baked, or boiled."

As wave after wave of indignation passed over him, his wrath at oppression extended to all mankind. In "Gulliver's Travels" it is the human race that lies before him, how much altered for the worse by being flayed! But it is not pity he feels for the victim now. In man he only sees the littleness, the grossness, the stupidity, or the brutal degradation of Yahoos. Unlike other satirists—unlike Juvenal or Pope or the author of "Penguin Island," who comes nearest to his manner—he pours his contempt, not upon certain types of folly or examples of vice, but upon the race of man as a whole. "I heartily hate," he wrote to Pope soon after "Gulliver" was published, "I heartily hate and detest that animal called man, although I heartily love John, Peter, Thomas, and so forth." The philanthropist will often idealise man in the abstract and hate his neighbor at the back door, but that was not Swift's way. He has been called an inverted hypocrite, as one who makes himself out worse than he is. We should rather call him an inverted idealist, for, with high hopes and generous expectations, he entered into the world, and, lacerated by rage at the cruelty, foulness, and lunacy he there discovered, he poured out his denunciations upon the crawling forms of life whose filthy minds were well housed in their apelike and corrupting flesh—a bag of loathsome carrion.

"Noli æmulari," sang the cheerful Psalmist; "Fret not thyself because of evildoers." How easy for most of us it is to follow that comfortable counsel! How little strain it puts upon our popularity and our courage! And how amusing it is to watch the course of human affairs with tolerant acquiescence! Yes, but, says Swift, "amusement is the happiness of those who cannot think," and may we not say that acquiescence is the cowardice of those who dare not feel? There will always be some, at least, in the world whom savage indignation, like Swift's, will continually torment. It will eat their flesh and exhaust their spirits. They would gladly be rid of it, for, indeed, it stifles their existence, depriving them alike of pleasure, friends, and the objects of ambition—isolating them in the end as Swift was isolated. If only the causes of their indignation would cease, how gladly they would welcome the interludes of quiet! But hardly is one surmounted than another overtops them like a wave, nor have the stern victims of indignation the smallest hope of deliverance from their suffering, until they lie, as Swift has now lain for so many years, where cruel rage can tear the heart no more—"Ubi sæva indignatio cor ulterius lacerare nequit."

THE DECAY OF MELODRAMA.

THERE is a state of mind in which it is proper to visit a melodrama, as there is a state of mind in which it is proper to go to church. You must leave behind you your problems, your bewilderments, your eccentricities. On this stage nothing is in doubt. It is not here that new casuistries are applied to old sins, or fresh solutions sought for ancient bewilderments. You expect from the melodramatist a firm and unquestioning morality, a well-trying plot, an inevitable end. His message has the certainty of orthodox preaching, and it comes to you with the assurance of anonymity. The author's name, perhaps, is in the bills; but you do not look for it. The curtain is his surplice, the cheers of the gallery his ordination. He stands in an apostolic succession, and you may predict of him, before you have seen his piece, that he will question none of the councils and prevaricate over none of the articles. In his pulpit there is no heresy. Virtue will always triumph. Of his erring characters one at least will have a heart of gold. The ingénue will assuredly wear yellow hair. The villainess will certainly dress in black. You go to the solemn performance, not because you look for novelty, but because you are comfortably certain of its absence. It is a ritual, and you love it because it stirs in your breast the older loyalties, the surer faiths of our race. You would resent a variation, as you would a new ceremonial in your village church. So it was that our ancestors saw life, and so our descendants will see it. The footlights are a consecrated illumination which range the shadows and adjust the glories, as men have chosen to see them adjusted, since ever their hands could clap. On this stage no piece is ever stale. It has its repertory theatre in every village booth, where still you may see the classic "Iron Box"—an adaptation of Godwin's "Caleb Williams"—or the older and still more classic "Sweeney Todd." They have never bent to changing fashions. Their morality submits to no social evolution. Their judgments admit no "larger hope." In their world, vice is vice and virtue is virtue, and the naval officer always marries the golden girl. Here alone is your quod semper, your quod ubique. Cross the Channel, and you will find that strolling companies are playing the same pieces with the same morality to Norman peasants at village fairs. The uniforms are changed. The local color is varied. But the same brave men share with the same tender women the splendors of the stage and the plaudits of the pit.

A blind man who knows the traditions of our stage can find his way to the melodrama with no guiding hand to lead him. The acid scent of oranges is its symbol and advertisement. The orange-seller does not ply her trade outside the theatres where strenuous crowds are waiting to be harrowed by "Justice," or to be caught in some guilty triangle of the affections. The orange is not the fruit of the intellectuals, nor yet of the frivolous and the light-minded. It is part of a usage which never varies. Where Drury Lane opens towards Covent Garden this venerable trade grew up. An innovating London has swept away the cloistered inns and the timbered houses. The narrow lanes admit to-day the sun which for three centuries they never saw, and wild flowers are growing on the waste land where once was the centre of a nation's revels. But the faint scent from the orange-woman's basket brings back with it the ghosts who sold and bought and paid their duty to melodrama on this narrow acre between restoration and revolution, from Commonwealth to County Council. Just so Nell Gwynne must have stood as the chairs and the coaches set down their brilliant burdens. In these days oranges were not the exclusive solace of the pit. One is constrained to believe that King Charles himself must have devoured them between the acts and flung the skins upon the floor of the royal box.

It was the orange-woman who lured us into the Aldwych Theatre. Cucullus non facit monachum. It takes more than an orange to make a melodrama. We confess we were a little suspicious of the title of the piece. "The Bad Girl of the Family" has a meretricious, even a modern, ring about it. The true melodrama deals rather with the good girl. Its votaries are interested, above all, in the triumph of virtue. Nor were the posters altogether promising. That lady with the sinister leer belongs to another tradition. Woman in melodrama is not the destroyer or the vampire. She errs, indeed, but always by the defects of her qualities. If we are to consider it nicely, Mr. Walter Melville's piece marks a decay and a decline in British melodrama. The music-hall has invaded his stage, and the clowning riots out of all reason and proportion. Melodrama demands its broad humors, its physical jokes, its recognised absurdities. But here, too, something is due to tradition. It is to sin against all the canons of the art that the tragic characters should themselves lapse into their moments of buffoonery. The essence of the tradition is its sincerity, its broad and clear-browed seriousness. We must know from the beginning who are the laughable and who are the pathetic personages. What is tolerable in the Irishman or the old woman is not allowed in the heavy lady or the ingénue. We respect a yellow wig when we see it; it may make us weep, it may make us cheer, but it must not make us laugh. We know the deep chest notes appropriate to stage wickedness; they must not be varied by a screaming falsetto. It is, moreover, past all forgiving that a moving scene, in which the heroine is about to be arrested for a murder, should suddenly degenerate into a pillow-fight between girls and policemen. We speak of these things gravely and with regret. There is a great classic tradition to conserve, and no one who honors the history of our stage can see it violated without a serious protest. Mr. Melville is playing Strausslike tricks with a form as reverent and inviolable as the symphony itself. These indecent familiarities, where all should be high purpose and pure emotion, are as gross violations of good taste as the splashing of the baby in its bath midway in the Symphonia Domestica, or the bleating of the sheep in Don Quixote. Mr. Melville murders passably well. But the suspicion seizes us that he does not take his own plots seriously. We do. We were all agog for the tragic sequel. We thrilled when the "bad girl" rushed, a panting fugitive, into that bedroom. We applauded with all our hands when those spirited girls vowed that they would save their comrade. The least that we expected was that one of them would thrust her slender arm, like Catharine Douglas, into the staple of the lock. There had come one of those tense heroic moments for which melodrama exists. It was an impishness worthy of Mr. Shaw which gave us a pillow-fight for our anticlimax. We hasten to add that, although Mr. Melville's piece is decadent and frivolous melodrama, it does at least retain some relics of a great inheritance. The "bad girl" is really good at heart—had it been otherwise we should not have deemed her history worthy of notice, nor would the crowds have flocked to see her. The morality throughout rings true and sure—though the moral speeches, we regret to state, are almost epigrammatic in their brevity. There is a convict scene, and a stirring marriage scene. There is a bad earl, and a good thief. Mr. Melville is worth a remonstrance. Had he canonised the earl, or damned the thief, we should have consigned him to the oblivion which is the uttermost darkness.

Melodrama is decadent. Yet the fault lies, we are convinced, with the dramatists and not with the public. These vast crowds which flock to "The Bad Girl" lack nothing of the old seriousness, the essential loyalty of mind. And it is the pit which makes the melodrama. You may write your problem-play as you will, and it matters little how the public receives it. You have done your thinking aloud. But of a melodrama there is only one test. It is that your audience should hiss your villains. Fail in that, and you have failed in all. There was nothing wanting at the Aldwych in the heartiness with which the audience hissed. We can conceive no prouder moment in an actor's career than that in which he first receives this tribute to his realism. So Apelles must have felt when the birds pecked at the cherries on his canvas. He is lost in his art, forgotten in his own success. He knows that his hearers have judged him as they judge of life. They are in no mood to recognise counterfeits and simulacra. Your drawing-room play may turn on philanderings and flirtations, on misunderstandings to be cleared up, on points of casuistry to be determined. But the melodrama inherits a robust tradition. The sins with which it deals are real crimes, which end at Portland or the galleys. There is something at stake. There are lives in the balance. The Greeks, also, knew that it needed such material as this to make a great play. They dealt for choice with a parricide or a matricide, or hung their tragedy on the sack of a city or a human sacrifice. It is in these footprints, if he did but know it, that the melodramatist treads. His benevolent convict is a Prometheus Bound. His wicked earl with one fair daughter is a lineal descendant of Agamemnon. He is right to eschew innovation. The great themes of tragedy were long ago discovered. The primitive myths of the long-lost child, the birth-mark and the forbidden marriage, these are the things which natural man has cared to hear of since first he sought in ordered speech to tell his rarer experiences. For it is the chance of such happenings as these which is the salt of life. Life is for the simple man a lottery in which none of the numbers count, save the fatal number which is drawn. He endures in daily life the barren tedium, in which there are no coincidences and rarely a complication. When he goes to the theatre it is with the demand that one of these portents shall happen there. It happens, he applauds, and comes away. The wisdom of the ages, the experience of unnumbered generations, has once more been confirmed.

Short Studies.

THE SIGN OF ALLAH!*

(A Monologue.)

You want me to tell you how I came to know you, my little son, do you? Then lean your head on my knees and you shall know all about it.

Many years ago, that is, before I knew you, I had become very ill. It was my soul that was sick, so much so that death appeared to me as a great deliverance. I remember well the nights that I lay on the tin floor of the balcony in your grandfather's house. My body was freezing, but my soul was burning and throbbing and shedding tears of poison. Sometimes in life, dear one, you will realise that, but I hope that it will not be to the extent of my realisation.

The doctors had told us that I would be cured if Allah sent His Sign. And not long after that I dreamt a dream in which I was asked to choose a soul among the souls of youth and I cried out, saying, "I choose the soul of the 'Sign of Allah.'" Then we knew that you would come before long.

And you did come! Wait a moment longer, my soul, and I shall tell you how; and also many more things that concern you.

I do not need to tell you that all this took place in your grandfather's house. It was in the small room that overlooks the garden gate. The whitewashed walls, the bare iron bed, the white dress of the doctor, and the clamoring of the crowd at the door keep their special place, not in my head, but in my heart. Somehow more than these, I have a vivid memory of how the smallest atom in my being contained the Universe, so infinite, so wonderful did I feel. It has been a marvel since how every human mother receiving a son drinks infinity to the very depths, and still continues to be a moving bit of maimed humanity on our poor earth.

"Let me see him, doctor!" said I, and the crowd at the door re-echoed my words. "Let us, O doctor, let us see the little visitor!" But the doctor was implacable. "Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "you will have to wait my good pleasure."

The crowd was headed by your grandfather, followed by various aunts, grandmothers, visitors, and servants. They all groaned with impatience till the door was opened. I waited eagerly till my turn came to look at your face.

"Subhan Allah!" they all exclaimed, "it is her face!" And when at last my thirsty eyes could look at you, I knew that I had come once more to the world, reproduced as only Allah can. Then I knew what it is to get the real assurance of eternity on earth. I do not know how many hours your little face kept the stamp that awed me. But I thrilled with the idea that the stamp may be deeper, and you may live my life, not as I have lived it, but as I have striven and struggled in vain to live. Among the soft wrappings your large orbs had such an unfathomable expression, your little mouth was serenely calm, and you had black curls that were strangely long for a newly-arrived little man.

My next vision and sensation is a prolonged rosy delight. You will know, my beloved son, that the greatest moments of one's life have some decided or faint color and perfume. I was carried to my bed as if I were a precious burden and the world consisted of rosy tints and delicious spices. Your little bed was all pink, the color under the lace of the pillows, even my night-dress and the globe through which the light filtered in that hallowed room.

There was to be a proper, old-fashioned Turkish reception in your honor next day. Arm-chairs were placed in a row opposite my bed, ready to receive great ladies and their congratulations. All the old heads of the family decided that your solemn looks and sacred Islamic name demanded a great deal of Turkish respect, and every detail was properly Turkish for the occasion. We had a separate old woman to make the hot sherbet for the visitors. (O, the all-invading spicy odor of it!) Another old woman was to wash your clothes for forty days, for the clothes of the baby for forty days are sacred, and great care is taken as to where the water is thrown and whether it is likely that the Jinns may get wet and revenge themselves by horrible misdoings. There was a nurse and another servant especially for those days to wait on us. One extra old woman, who was provided for fear that some other might fail, completed the great number of far and near relatives and attendants staying for forty days. There were three onions wrapt in muslin and tied with rosy ribbons hanging on the wall, to procure plenty of milk for you. There was a red bow everywhere and a Koran to protect us from the inhabitants of the fairy world.

You know our dear, old, fat Mme. Themie, the Greek nurse. She was not very scientific, she quaked at the arrival of the over-particular doctor, but whiskered old-fashioned remedies into the believing ears of the old women. She used to call you, "lili ha." Nobody knows what it meant, but it was such a soft, clinging silkiness of sound that it just suited you then. Those dim and warm August nights she walked up and down chanting and shaking you rhythmically, with soft melody: "Io lili li li li kamou. . . ." It was so much you, my soul, that every "li" inundated my bosom, penetrated into my heart and limbs with something so warm, living, and blissful, that ever since that time each happy falling out of consciousness into sleep brings back to me that soft, meaningless melody: "Io li li li lili-kamou. . . ."

* Ayetullah, a Turkish boy's name, means "The Sign of Allah."

Then came the first pain of those wondrous balmy days. Some of the crowd had departed. The nurse was dining downstairs, and your Aunt Nermine sat on my bed waiting. Both of us listened anxiously to the movement in the little pink bed. You were three days old and had not cried yet—which appeared rather unnatural to the nurse. All at once there was a dovelike murmur, followed by an unlooked-for yell. Your Aunt jumped up in an instant, and you were taken on to your cushion on the floor. But do what she would, she could not arrange the funny pink legs that rebelled. The next moment I, too, jumped down, though I was not to move for many more days. When I also failed to quiet you, we both of us sat there weeping in unison with you. At that instant I felt that it was impossible for me to survive all the crying that you would naturally do in the course of babyhood. The next moment we were thumping on the floor as a sign of alarm. Everybody ran up, but when they found us weeping with you there was a general roar of unkind laughter. Numberless are the times that I have wept for you and with you, my soul, but none had the helpless grief of that time.

My great occupation of the first months and years was your self and your service, with the continual worry that your nurse caused me. She was an Anatolian woman of the densest kind, and it was impossible for her to understand the necessity of wearing stockings and not eating certain food. The moment she found out our great adoration for you and the way your health depended on her, she was all caprice, all unreasonable demands. I was so worn out with nightly care that the doctor ordered us to remove my bedroom from being next to yours. I was to sleep at the other side of the house where I could not hear your voice. That very night we left our bedroom and our beds were laid on the floor of the north room. How terrible it seemed to me! I remember the many times I used to creep out of bed and tremble in the cold and dark corridor listening for your voice.

What a wonderful three months those were! You were a most beautiful little thing. Your dark eyes were violet blue, and you had such silky hair and a divine gaze in your eyes.

It was Ramazan, one of those wakeful and gay nights; your grandfather had not come home. That was not strange for one night, but when he did not come the next evening there fell an ominous silence on the house. As I walked in and out with restless anxiety, your father came after me and told me the reason of your grandfather's absence. He was to have a rather dangerous operation which had been put off. Not to make us suffer unnecessarily, he had gone to the hospital and was to have the operation the next morning. Everybody was to know this except myself. As each word fell like a cut of a sharp knife on my heart, a feeling much like that of the children of Israel visited me. God was jealous of too much happiness, and He would not allow me to have two such beloved ones near me. As if to ward off the Anger of Fate, I did not go to your room that night, and sat shivering and weeping in that cold north room, bitten by all the winds of the Bosphorus. It was impossible to cross the water at night,* and I had to bear that agony until morning as best I could. I do not know when or how I went over to the German Hospital next day. As I entered his room, his beloved pale face lay in all its Christlike gentleness as still as it could be.

* On account of police regulations against any navigation on the Bosphorus after one hour after sunset. The writer was at Scutari. The hospitals are at Pera.

The next day as I sat opposite him reading to him from that dear story-teller, Hans Christian Andersen, there was a knock at the door and Hussein entered. His face was very queer, and he stood hesitating as if he had a very grave thing to say.

"The nurse has become ill, effendim," he said, "and I have come to fetch you."

Both of us understood that something had happened to you. As I began putting on my veil hastily, I saw your grandfather's dear face grow pale and his affectionate eyes fill with tears.

"I shall telegraph immediately, baba,"* I said thickly, and walked on. I do not quite remember the drive and the boat of that fateful day, but as the carriage dragged up our hill, I saw another carriage going down in haste, and there was our doctor with a very grave and thoughtful face. I cannot explain why I did not speak to him, but I was completely petrified. As I entered the gate I saw the cook pumping water and looking at me with an awed curiosity, the kind of look given to those stricken by the hand of Allah.

"Is he alive yet?" I sobbed, as I ran up the stairs. But no one answered.

I heard footsteps and a slight murmur in your room. I pushed open the door and walked in. There you were in the same place as when you first came, and you lay in a towel, your little face livid with the agony of the attack, and your beloved eyes staring with terrible pain. The world seemed whirling and passing away, and I was hopelessly weak and powerless to hold on to anything. The next reality for me was a sudden hatred of the strange doctor left in charge. He had the face of a cat, with a bushy, disagreeable beard that intensified the horror of the moment, although I could not tell why. Your first attacks were not long, but they were worse than your first tears. No creature in medieval ages was more exquisitely tortured than your mother was, when your attacks came on.

The next torturing element during those times was your nurse.

"I want to eat oily dishes and I will not wear stockings," she would say all of a sudden, and the next moment she would pull them off and walk into the corridor with insolent ease. How I fought with myself to obtain that moral quality, that patience which I had never possessed.

"I want Broussa silks and a burnouse; above all, a silk veil."

"I am sorry, nurse, that I cannot get you those things, especially this month."

"Can't you? Then you will pay all that money to the doctor, for you know that the baby's health depends on my happiness; if I am refused, my milk will turn sour, and the baby will have convulsions."

She repeated this refrain; if she were refused anything, she knew what to do. She would just open her bosom and stand before the window. With her stupid blue eyes full of defiance she would stare into my eyes.

"Shut that window, nurse; don't be a child."

"A child! I shall do what I please. In my country we don't have such nonsense."

One day when life seemed unbearable and she especially worrying, I opened the door and said coolly:

"You can go, nurse. I will find another."

"Find another, indeed! Don't you know the change of milk will kill the dear one?"

"Then let him die," I answered, leaving her to apostrophise the Constantinople ladies and their tyranny. It was a white day in our city, the ground covered with snow. But I drove into all the mysterious old quarters of Stamboul, looking for a nurse. My search was in vain. That evening your old nurse was all love and indignant loyalty towards you.

"I will not be able to leave the baby," she wept falsely; all the time watching my face with the corners of her cunning little eyes. But she did leave you three times, in spite of vows, and was brought back in triumph, driving at the right of your grandfather, and her wages increased.

* Baba—father.

Days grew into months and months into years, and you grew to be a more significant Sign of Allah. My turn also came to be on the verge of death when you were only four. But in a house of careless attendants your little soul and your little body respected my struggles with death, and you hardly moved for fear of disturbing me. That was the time when so many doctors used to come to our house. You remember it, do you, my soul? I remember, also, the day you crept silently to my bed. Then I saw your little face shadowed with patient loneliness and neglect, and I vowed that I would live on to help you some more years through life.

At times I wonder how anybody can be so blest as to have you both, my little sons; without one of you we would be incomplete. Besides, there is the great Idea that has come to all the mothers of our beloved country. Shall I ever be called on to choose between you and the Idea? I do not know how I would act, beloved, but in either case you will love and forgive me. If I choose the Idea, you know that we must all live and die for it. If I choose you, it is because you are the Sign of Allah which has kissed my soul into love, and I am only a weak mother.

So, little Sign from Allah of mine, you know that you are the first element and face in bringing to my heart the great and sublime love which has so many other little elements and faces.

The Drama.

THE TRIPLE BILL.

It is pleasant to catch the Meredith accent on the stage, and yet one feels that the stage is not the place for it. "The Sentimentalists," which holds the middle place in the triple bill at the Repertory Theatre, would seem, on internal evidence, to be an early work of the author of "Evan Harrington" and "The Egoist." Not that the style is uncharacteristic or undeveloped; on the contrary, it is Meredith all over and nothing but Meredith. What seems to date the fragment is the flavor of the 'forties that hangs about its conception and structure. Though the style is far enough removed from the amazing bombast of Sheridan Knowles, yet the piece seems to belong to the period when Sheridan Knowles was possible. Its incompleteness is not so tantalising as might have been expected, for one does not feel any anticipation balked, any development cut short. Rather, one may guess that the fragment remained a fragment because no very inevitable development suggested itself to the author. The best scene in the play, from a stage point of view—and an excellent comedy invention—is that in which the inconsolable young widow, Astræa, talks about one of her suitors for an undivided quarter of an hour, in pointing out to her confidant that he must not be talked about. When, in the second scene, the characters dropped into blank verse, I confess that my interest flagged. One certainly sees no reason to regret that the theatre of Meredith's prime was not in such a condition as to tempt him to devote his genius to it. The piece is most originally mounted, and charmingly played by Miss Fay Davis, Miss Mary Jerrold, Mr. Charles Maude, and their comrades.

Mr. J. M. Barrie plays in and plays out his friend and master. He plays him in with a very powerful little drama in a quite new vein for him; he plays him out with a comedy in his old vein, at its brightest and pleasantest.

Mr. Barrie is the last man one would have expected to take a leaf out of the book of Edgar Allan Poe; but "Old Friends" suggests nothing so much as a tale by that genius of the uncanny. Up to a certain point, within ten minutes of the end, it is, to my mind, entirely successful. Never has an atmosphere of vague dread, a sense of imminent disaster, been more powerfully suggested on the stage. Mr. Dion Boucicault's excellent production contributed not a little to this effect. One sat fascinated and intent, wondering what doom impended over this seemingly secure and peaceful household. Unfortunately, when the true nature of the tragedy revealed itself, though it surpassed one's wildest expectations in point of horror, it at the same time aroused certain doubts—doubts of its physical possibility, doubts of its moral justification. These doubts are interdependent, and are easily stated. In the first place, is it possible for the taint of alcoholism to transmit itself from one generation to another in the way Mr. Barrie indicates? In the second place, if there is the least shadow of uncertainty on this point, is an author justified in suggesting ideas and apprehensions on so painful a topic that may have no foundation in physiological fact? If Mr. Barrie has convinced himself that his facts are right, my second query falls to the ground, and he is doing a social service in uttering this most impressive warning. None the less does it remain artistically imprudent to found a play on an assumption which, to say the least of it, is not universally accepted, either by men of science, or by the man in the street. The scientific orthodoxy of the day (I take it) denies the inheritance of acquired characteristics; and Stephen Brand's own account of his case leaves no doubt that his alcoholism is, so to speak, an accidental acquisition, not an ancestral proclivity. I cannot, of course, pretend to any competent opinion in the matter. I must own, indeed, that Weissmannism, so far as I understand it, leaves me unconvinced, and that I am not personally indisposed to admit the possibility of the case Mr. Barrie presents. But science, on the stage, ought to be either purely fantastic or absolutely undoubted. We admit without difficulty the potion that changes Dr. Jekyll into Mr. Hyde; it is a case of "credo quia impossibile." But if the slightest doubt lingers in our minds as to the possibility of such a case as that of Carry Brand, we decline to yield ourselves up to the illusion, and the play misses its artistic aim. When the idea began to dawn on me, I imagined for a moment that Stephen Brand's vice had infected, not his daughter, but his wife: a much more acceptable and scarcely less tragic contingency. But when I realised the true state of the case I could not but feel that the horror, though skilfully and even poetically touched, was not quite legitimate.

Curiously paradoxical, too, is the reason assigned by Mrs. Brand for the chill contempt which she feels for her husband. She will give him no credit for his conquest of his vice, because she holds that it was not a real conquest at all. "Our sins," she says, "tire of us and leave us—we don't give them the entertainment they need." This may be roughly true of certain other vices, but surely not of the alcoholic habit. At any rate, whether true or not, it is a novel idea, which we ought not to be expected to accept offhand. If it was worth stating, it was worth developing more fully.

I sincerely trust that the reservations which have to be made with regard to "Old Friends" will not discourage Mr. Barrie from developing the more serious and even tragic side of his talent. Though its fundamental idea is scarcely acceptable, the play shows very remarkable power and originality, which ought by no means to be suffered to run to waste. At the same time, it is refreshing to find Mr. Barrie, in "The Twelve-Pound Look," reverting for the nonce to his lighter vein. He here treats one of his most whimsical inventions with his subtlest and most penetrating humor. The title of the little play will soon become proverbial; for it is at least as apt a contribution to feminine psychology as "What Every Woman Knows." How many husbands, for how many years to come, will look furtively at their wives' faces for "the twelve-pound look"! And how many, seeing it, will remain blind to it! Description or analysis would merely spoil the reader's pleasure in the play, which is eminently a thing to be seen. As acted by Miss Lena Ashwell and Mr. Edmund Gwenn, it far more than redeems whatever drawbacks may be found in the other items of the triple bill.

Mr. Somerset Maugham's play, "The Tenth Man," at the Globe, is an extremely clever but rather superficial drawing-room drama, which stands out from the common herd of clever superficialities by reason of Mr. Bouchier's very remarkable acting. His portraiture of the rotten financier, George Winter, M.P., is by far the best thing Mr. Bouchier has ever done, and I do not hesitate to call it one of the most masterly performances of our generation. It is daring, original, and highly colored, yet without the least exaggeration or caricature. Here is one more proof, among a hundred, that the English stage can hold its own, in respect of acting, with any theatre in the world.

THE LORDS AND A REFERENDUM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Among the many suggestions that have been put forward as to the policy of the Government in dealing with the House of Lords, I have seen no mention of one particular proposal which seems to me to deserve consideration. If the Government remain in office long enough to send up their Bill on the veto to the House of Lords, that House presumably will reject it. We shall then have a General Election under conditions very similar to those which prevailed at the election just concluded. The Government will appeal to the country on the question of the Lords; but the Unionists, presumably, will do all they can to obscure that issue. They will unite, as before, on talking about Tariff Reform, about Home Rule, about everything except the question on which they know themselves to be weakest. And whatever the result may be, we shall be told that the country has not given its verdict on any one of the conjoined issues that have been before it. There is, so far as I can see, only one way of avoiding this difficulty. The Government could attach to their Bill dealing with the House of Lords a clause directing that the Bill be referred to the country by referendum before it becomes law. The Lords, it is true, might still reject the Bill; but if they did so, their position would be weakened and that of the Government strengthened. In particular, it would be clear that the new attitude assumed by that House, that they only desire to consult the electorate, is the hypocritical pretence Liberals have always asserted it to be. On the other hand, the Lords might think it more politic to pass the Bill. In that case, and in that case only, the country would vote definitely on that one single issue. Each elector would be asked to declare on his voting paper whether he is in favor of the Bill or no, and it would be impossible for him to vote on any other question. I see no other way of ascertaining what the judgment of the country really is on the House of Lords, and that is what Liberals, at least, desire to know. There may be objections to the plan, which have not occurred to me, but its advantages appear to me obvious.—Yours, &c.,

G. LOWES DICKINSON.

THE REFUSAL OF SUPPLIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Asquith's failure to obtain satisfactory guarantees for the passage of his Veto Bill through the Lords before accepting office thrusts the responsibility for the defence of popular government upon the private Members of Parliament, and on the people themselves. The Premier's position, as chief Minister of the Crown, may be correct enough, but it is certainly not the duty of the private member to support him in it. It is the duty of Parliament to insist on the redress of grievances before supply, whether supply be asked for by a modern Cabinet or by a Stuart King. That, I contend, is the elementary function of our House of Commons. Whatever Mr. Asquith himself meant in his Albert Hall speech, it is certain that most of the anti-peer majority in the House pledged themselves quite honestly to support him in the sense in which they, and nearly everyone else, understood him. They are pledged, and their constituents expect them, to support no Government which has taken office without adequate guarantees for the destruction of the veto.

What we want at the present moment is, it seems to me, a definite refusal on the part of an adequate number of members, to vote even the Budget until it is clear that the Veto Bill will actually become law this year. The Premier has pointed to the chaos likely to result if the financial votes are not obtained at once, and this seems to be regarded by Ministers as conclusive reason for voting supplies. It is nothing of the kind. Our liberties have been founded on just such situations as the present. Our early Kings did not love Parliaments, and rarely summoned them, except when, without their aid, there would have been a financial deadlock. The extremity of the King was the opportunity of the people.

But if it is the duty of the private member of the House to refuse supplies without redress of grievances, it is equally the duty of earnest democrats outside of it to assist him. The time is, of course, very short, but is it not possible to organise a number of "Veto First" demonstrations in those parts of the country which, as the elections have shown, are enthusiastically anti-peer? If we can only get the people to understand that Mr. Asquith's attitude is not endorsed by his followers, the solid majorities from the industrial centres will, I am convinced, stand firm until the veto question is settled once for all. But the memory of the way in which the Lords escaped in 1884 still rankles, and these very majorities will melt like snow if they are not given a fighting lead. Could not the Labor Party take the lead in this? There is a great opportunity for them.

It seems to me that all our difficulties are those due to a lack of courage. If the Radicals and the Labor Party make up their minds to refuse supplies if need be, it will be our enemies and not we who will immediately be in trouble. No doubt, the financial aspect of the matter is grave, and we may depend upon it that both Whig and Tory bankers and manufacturers know that as well as we do. No Budget, except that of last year, is possible in this House of Commons, and any further delay in collecting taxes, any further borrowing, would seriously affect securities. It is probably a realisation of this, certainly not any respect for the electors, that has made Lord Lansdowne promise a safe passage for the Budget through the Lords. There will be great searchings of hearts and much negotiating in wealthy circles if it be made clear that the Budget cannot go through the House of Commons without either Tory connivance or guarantees. What the upshot of such negotiations would be it is impossible to say; but refusal of supplies on the part of Radicals and Labor men would, at least, convince the anti-peer majority of the electorate that they still had leaders thoroughly worthy of support, and would leave the road open for future victory.

I think if a "cave" were formed, consisting of the advanced Radicals and Labor men, to adopt the following policy, there would be a possibility of early, and a certainty of ultimate, victory. The members of the cave should pledge themselves (1) to abstain from voting for the Budget of 1909 unless guarantees were given for the safety of the Veto Bill; and (2) to vote against any modified Budget that may be patched up, by Whig and Tory collusion, to get over the deadlock.—Yours, &c.,

"THE TWO ENGLANDS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with great interest your fine article on the two Englands, but it appears to me that there is still a deeper sense in which one can speak of two Englands.

I do not simply mean the class cleavage between rich and poor, but the existence through British history from the very beginning of two totally different types of Englishmen inspired by opposite ideals.

The first type may have in private life a very strict idea of personal responsibility, but his whole outlook on life is narrowed by a stiff, legalistic system of morals and a high sense of what is respectable and proper; his respect for rank, wealth, authority, is so great that he does not only resist every attempt towards progress but that he considers religion itself merely as a State establishment, a guarantee of the social order. In politics, and especially in international politics, his aims are freely national, imperialist; they lack generosity and unselfishness, and the highest moral principles must yield when the Empire's welfare is at stake. Of course, the imperialist's idea of the uniqueness of Great Britain's rule and of the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon race is not without magnitude, but history shows us that he is only aiming at material power and territorial greatness.

That type of Englishman has played an important part in English history; the present empire is largely his work. We find him everywhere—in the Army, in the Navy, in politics, and in the Church. Men like Laud, Clive, Castlereagh, Wellington, Cecil Rhodes, and the present Unionist leaders, are typical examples of the kind.

On the other hand, we have a totally different type, the idealist, the progressive Englishman (with whom we might include the Scotsman and the Welshman). He is not attracted by ideas like the Frenchman, but he feels very strongly moral ideals. If he has a much higher conception of social responsibility than the other man, it is often because his religious faith is real, alive, turned towards progress, the firm basis of his civic faith. He is ready to fight desperately against Wealth, Rank, Convention, to defend his liberties, and the rights of his weaker brethren. He is convinced, as Lord Morley puts it, "that progress on its political side means more than anything else the substitution of justice as a governing idea instead of Privilege." He loves England, and is ready to die for her, not because she is rich and powerful, but because she embodies an ideal of liberty. He is the man that has made Great Britain the home of Parliamentary government, and one of the bulwarks of progress. We find his spirit at work through British history from the Middle Ages. It is the author of Piers Ploughman, with his pity for the poor and his wrath against the lazy rich; it is Wycliffe and the Lollards, with their cry for religious freedom and social righteousness; it is Latimer speaking against the sins of London; it is the Independents and the Puritans with Milton and Cromwell, reasserting the liberties of the citizen and the rights of Parliament; it is Wesley and Whitefield waking up the religious conscience of the nation; it is Fox, Priestley, and Wilberforce, fighting for the rights of man; it is Gladstone, Cobden and Bright, with their zeal for freedom, both in their country and abroad; it is all the great British poets and writers, the Wordsworths, the Tennysons, the Brownings, the Burnses, the Carlyles and many others, who loved humanity and liberty. It is nowadays the Radicals and Socialists, too numerous to mention, who are boldly fighting the great fight for coming democracy, against a powerful Conservatism.

In fact, as politics have played in English history a very prominent place, we might say, to sum up, that all things considered, the two great political parties have been for the last century a fairly good representation of the two Englands. In any case it was my privilege to be in England during the General Election, and I was struck by the opposition between the ideals of the two sides. On the one hand was Rank, Privilege, all the "respectable" things of this world, coupled with Jingoism, hatred of the foreigner, and a genuine fear of the working-classes. On the other, there was a noble, often deeply religious, ideal of social justice, a bold faith in its ultimate triumph, a keen sense of the right of Parliament and the duties of the British citizen, coupled with a true love of humanity.

Of course, Great Britain is much too complex a country to be divided abruptly in two parts. There are not two Englands, but twenty; and we foreigners find it impossible to understand them all, or even one of them. But, nevertheless, the distinction between imperialist and idealist England appears to me fundamental, and explains perhaps some of the contradictions of British history.—Yours, &c.,

ANDRÉ DE BAVIER.

25, rue Franklin, Paris,
March 3rd, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed a word of comment on your interesting article on "The Two Englands"? You seem to me to have fallen a victim to the optical illusion fostered by a study of one of the colored electoral maps.

It is true that in the North of England and Wales the progressive forces reckoned by votes are in a majority, and that in the South of England they are in a minority. But in each case the superiority in votes is far from being so overwhelming as to justify an inference of a complete difference in social and political aspirations.

In Northern England (including Wales and Monmouth) there were cast at the last election 1,474,163 Ministerialist and 1,075,377 Unionist votes; or, speaking roughly and allowing something for the plural voter, the Ministerialists were to their opponents in a ratio of 3 to 2. In the rest of England there were 1,521,452 Unionist and 1,295,718 Ministerialist votes, or, again speaking roughly, the Unionists were to their opponents in a ratio of about 7 to 6—or, if plural votes be allowed for, there was perhaps almost an equality. The truth is that the supposed territorial division of opinion is an illusion which under a rational system of proportional representation would disappear.

If we southern Ministerialists were represented in proportion to our strength we should have a permanent fighting force, well and strongly led, which might soon give us, even in the South, a majority. One of the worst results of our present electoral system is that it takes away the strongest men from the very points of the fighting line where they are most needed. Under proportional representation it would be otherwise.—Yours, &c.,

J. F. W.

REFORM OR VETO?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—For the time being the danger of combining the reform of the House of Lords with its veto seems to have happily gone. But at the same time we are told that the declared policy of the Liberal Party is to veto the Lords first, and then reform its composition "on a democratic basis." So it is just as well to set out the basic reason why many Liberals and many students of our constitution refuse altogether to consider the question of the reform of the House of Lords.

Many subsidiary tactical reasons have already been given. For example, that a policy of reform was never before the country at the recent election; that the question of the veto is hard enough to tackle without tacking on reform; that the Liberal Party will never combine on any one method of reform, and so on. But the real basic reason of our opposition lies deeper still. We oppose all measures of reform because any such measure, e.g., making the House of Lords elective, inevitably tends to strengthen it. That is to say, it leads towards "separation des pouvoirs," in opposition to our present unitary system of government. It strikes at the whole root of our constitution.

In order to understand this, it is necessary to go back to our University days, and to try and remember what we then learnt about comparative, analytical, and deductive politics. We shall find that—speaking broadly—there are two kinds of Second Chambers, those which aim at securing representative and personal weight respectively for their members. Those which aim at securing personal weight are alone possible for a Parliamentary system of government which endeavors to secure representative weight for a system that separates carefully the legislative from the executive functions. Why this is so, I have not the space to explain in a short letter like this. But read Bagehot, Dicey, Anson, Sidgwick, and Lowes Dickinson, and you will agree that it is so.

The English constitution, for good or ill, through long centuries has evolved a Parliamentary system of government, i.e., a unitary system, for which any elective, or, indeed, any strong Second Chamber is essentially undesirable. Indeed "under a Parliamentary system of government" (I quote Professor Sidgwick) "there is nothing to show that a Second Chamber is necessary or even desirable."

Curb its powers, leave its composition alone, and let this already moribund anachronistic survival of the medieval system of estates die a natural death. Such seems to be the legitimate course of events in a democratic direction to a student of English history.—Yours, &c.,

THE KING'S ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article in this week's number on "The King's English," you state that you have not seen the phrase used in the same sense as "The Queen's English."

May I, therefore, draw your attention to a book bearing that title, which Mr. Frowde published in 1906 for the University of Oxford? The book does not claim to be an English Grammar in the ordinary sense of the term, for the principle adopted throughout is "to pass by all rules, of whatever absolute importance, that are shown by observation to be seldom or never broken; and to illustrate by living examples, with the name of a reputable authority attached to each, all blunders that observation shows to be common." Human nature being what it is, those "living examples" add greatly to the piquancy of the reading. But although the anonymous authors claim nothing more for their work than that it may do something "for the negative (literary) virtues by mere exhibition of what should be avoided," the claim is really far too modest; for the book is packed with suggestive recommendations inculcating the positive virtues. It is, moreover, written in so delightfully easy a style, with a vein of sub-acid humor running through it, as to provide for its readers a liberal education in style.

I venture to trouble you with this letter because I feel that the book is not nearly so widely known as it deserves to be.—Yours, &c.,

GOVERNMENT IN GREECE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—To one who has, like myself, spent a considerable part of the last two years in Greece and among Greeks, your recent article on the new Greek Government seems to be somewhat one-sided, and perhaps a little lacking in insight. You say, for instance, that the new Premier was "badly implicated in the worst phase of the Macedonian disturbances." Surely the stigma attaches to those who were implicated, not in the worst phases of the struggle, but in the first phases of it. It is really curious how ready people have been to pass judgments in connection with these unhappy "disturbances," without considering at all who were the original aggressors.

The fact is, that our sympathies with the Young Turks have been perhaps a little indiscriminate. It has, for example, been argued that Crete must not be ceded to Greece because to do so would damage the prestige of the new Turkish Government. This might or might not be the result. If there is a real equality between Turks and Greeks, Jews and Armenians, under the new Turkish régime, it is at least doubtful whether the ceding of Crete would wreck the Constitution. If, however, the new régime means that the Christian races of the Turkish Empire are going to be well-treated slaves of the whole Turkish nation, instead of badly treated or neglected slaves of a single despot, then it is getting from English Liberalism more support than it deserves. It might be the truest friendship to Turkey to point out how utterly she will lose our sympathies if she gives way to this temptation, and that, though we may respect, we cannot admire, from the point of view either of generosity or statesmanship, her insistence upon her rights over Crete. Turkey has a splendid chance of wiping out the past with Greece. Could she be possibly making a worse use of it? The question how the Cretan problem affects liberal and democratic Greece has not received nearly such friendly and thoughtful treatment. We have been inclined to forget that Crete is a Greek island, and its exclusion from the Greek Kingdom entirely unnatural. We have forgotten, too, in how real a sense Greece has been all along a centre of true Liberalism, not rendered more or less ineffective by class or race antipathies. From one point of view, that of the the archæologist, Greece is perhaps the richest country in the world, and from this point of view Greece represents the Liberal policy of the open door carried to its fullest extent. One good feature there certainly is about our present attitude towards Greece. It must at least make it plain to her that we are determined to keep peace in Europe. Possibly it may be incidentally necessary that Greece should have to make impossible promises about Crete, or to look on and see the Cretans "brought to their senses," as one of your contemporaries feelingly remarked last week; but if she has to, we might at least regret the necessity, and perhaps feel a little sorry at the loss of reputation that we shall ourselves incur.

Meanwhile, Greece is doing its best to put off the evil day, hoping that a new Gladstone may be found abroad, and its own resources may be developed at home. Whatever the policy and intentions of the League may be, it has, as a matter of fact, certainly helped to defer the crisis, and perhaps Greek politicians as a whole may not be altogether ungrateful to what you call its "brainless military despotism." Scarcely a word has been said during the whole of the last six months of the excellent behavior of the Greek people all through this trying time. I happened to be in Athens during the first few days of the "revolution." The whole city was evidently talking and thinking of nothing else. Crowds were flocking out to the place where the Army was encamped. It meant dreary waiting to get a tramcar going in that direction. But the crowds on the cars and the crowds in the streets were all behaving admirably. There was no demonstrating or rowdiness. The people of Athens and of Greece generally have certainly been showing us recently a splendid example of patience and self-restraint.—Yours, &c.,

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A misnomer has many a time played havoc with a good cause, and advanced an evil one by throwing dust into the eyes of the unthinking.

Why call a reactionary movement "Tariff Reform" instead of "Tariff Reaction"?

If instead of the Dutch word "Uitlander" we had used the good English word "foreigner," who knows but that the Boer War might have been averted?

If, in speaking of denominational schools (which they are), we avoided using the term "voluntary" schools (which they are not, for they are mainly supported by public money out of local rates, &c.), the vexed education question might have been satisfactorily settled by now.

Had Mr. Andrew Carnegie, in his recent letter to your journal (page 675), entitled "The Law of Surplus," employed the term "The Law of Over-Production," he could not have refuted the charge of sending steel abroad at lower than cost prices.

It is well known and admitted that over-production is the main cause of the disorganisation of honest and straightforward trading.—Yours, &c.,

THE LIBERAL PRESS IN SCOTLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Scottish Liberal" accuses his Liberal fellow-countrymen of being illogical, because they usually buy Unionist newspapers. He is wrong. Almost all people buy newspapers for their news, and not for their politics. Scottish Liberals find the best and most complete service of news in the "Glasgow Herald" and "Scotsman," and therefore buy these papers, while, of course, grumbling platonically at their political views. However keenly readers and advertisers may sympathise with the political creed of a newspaper, they will not buy it nor give advertisements to it unless they are assured that it returns them better value for their money than any of its rivals.

This elementary principle of human nature explains why Scottish Liberals read the "Glasgow Herald" and "Scotsman," why Manchester and Liverpool Unionists prefer the "Manchester Guardian" to their own organs, and why Yorkshire Liberals hold by the "Yorkshire Post." What the public wants is the best news—not a particular brand of political views. The recognition of this fact would save earnest politicians from needless worry.—Yours, &c.,

THE STUDY OF FREE TRADE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have not found it a very easy matter to comply with A. de Natorp's request; so much has been written in the last twenty years by social reformers.

He will find some useful lists of books in the "Daily News" Year Book, 1910, classified under the different subjects. On looking over my books I find the following are probably those that I have learnt most from:—

Money's "Elements of the Fiscal Problem," and also his latest publication, the "Fiscal Dictionary."

Bastiat's "Sophisms of Protection," an old book, but not superseded.

Mrs. Unwin's collection of letters under the title of "The Hungry Forties," a book that, if carefully read and pondered over, will teach much.

On the land question, the League for the Taxation of Land Values, 377, Strand, publish tracts and pamphlets.

Slater's "English Peasantry and the Enclosure of Commons."

Cadbury and Bryan's "Land and the Landless."

On the distribution of wealth, Slater's "Britain's Next Campaign," Rowntree's "Poverty," Money's "Riches and Poverty," and, most valuable, "The Minority Report," as published by the Committee for the Break-up of the Poor Law, 5, Clement's Inn. 2 vols. 1s. each.

On licensing, Rowntree & Sherwell's "Taxation of the Liquor Trade."

To the above I ought, perhaps, to add Henry George's "Progress and Poverty," Thorold Rogers's "Work and Wages," and Morley's "Life of Cobden."

I should recommend studying facts more than theories. Nothing appeals to the plain man like figures simply put.

For instance, it is a good method with intelligent Tariff Reformers to put such questions as, "How would you deal with the cotton trade under Protection, where there is an export trade of about the value of 100 million pounds and an import of only 7 million pounds?" This is more effective than the question of whether the standard of living is lower in Germany than in England.

It sets men thinking, and the endeavor to prove their theory often reduces their confidence, engendered by the plausible arguments of Tariff Reform specialists.

It is always essential to study well your opponent's side of the question, without which you cannot be effective. If he thinks he is teaching you, he will face the subject with less prejudice. In old Izaak Walton's words: "Treat him tenderly, as though you loved him."

If he presents an apparently unanswerable argument, do not leave it until you can give the explanation according to the Free Trade theory. This is always possible. We do well to recognise that there are some whose hide of prejudice is too thick for penetration, and to leave them for those who have not lost the faculty of thinking.—Yours, &c.,

A WEST COUNTRY LIBERAL.

Poetry.

JOHN-JOHN.

I DREAMT last night of you, John-John,
And thought you called to me,
And when I woke this morning, John,
I hoped your face to see;
But I was all alone, John-John,
Though still I heard your call;
I put my boots and bonnet on,
And took my Sunday shawl,
And went, full sure to find you, John,
To Balla fair.

The fair was just the same as then,
Five years ago to-day,
When first you left the thimble men
And came with me away;
For there again were thimble men,
And shooting galleries,
And card-trick men and maggie men,
Of all sorts and degrees;—
But not a trace of you, John-John,
Was anywhere.

I turned my face to home again,
And called myself a fool
To think you'd leave the thimble men
And live again by rule,
And go to mass and keep the fast,
And till the little patch;
My wish to have you home was past
Before I raised the latch
And pushed the door and saw you, John,
Sitting down there.

How cool you came in here, begad,
As if you owned the place!
But rest yourself there now, my lad—
'Tis good to see your face.
My dream is out, and now by it
I think I know my mind:
At six o'clock this house you'll quit,
And leave no grief behind;—
But until six o'clock, John-John,
My bit you'll share.

The neighbors' shame of me began
When first I brought you in;
To wed and keep a tinker man
They thought a kind of sin;
But now this three year since you're gone
'Tis pity me they do,
And that I'd rather have, John-John,
Than that they'd pity you.
Pity for me and you, John-John,
I could not bear.

Oh, you're my husband, right enough,
But what's the good of that?
You know you never were the stuff
To be the cottage cat,
To watch the fire and hear me lock
The door, and put out Shap—
But there now, it is six o'clock
And time for you to step.
God bless and keep you far, John-John!
And that's my prayer.

THE study of contemporary fiction at the Universities finds an advocate in Professor W. L. Phelps, who holds the chair of English Literature at Yale. Fourteen years ago he introduced a course on "Modern Novels" as an elective subject, and, though it met with a good deal of opposition at the time, Professor Phelps is still convinced of its value, and he justifies his procedure in an appendix to his recent book, "Essays on Modern Novelists." The main objection to novels as a University study is that a course confined to them is lacking in mental discipline, and this Professor Phelps hardly attempts to meet. He merely states that novels "can be taught in such a way as to produce the best kind of mental discipline, which consists, first, in compelling a student to do his own thinking, and, secondly, to train him properly in the expression of what ideas he has." Of course, in the hands of an ideal teacher almost anything can be made a means of mental discipline, but it is extravagant to claim that the works of even the best contemporary novelists come into the same category for educational purposes as the great masterpieces of classical literature. Professor Phelps does not, it is true, wish to supplant the study of the classics by the study of modern novels. He only urges that the latter should have their rightful place, and not be regarded either with contempt, or as unworthy of serious treatment. But there is little doubt that no good purpose would be served by the introduction of courses on novels in the Universities. Time is the only infallible test of literature, and it should be allowed to do its work in sifting the permanent from the ephemeral before a book is made the subject of careful study by those whose taste is not yet formed.

IN the meantime the crisis through which the English novel is passing shows few signs of a satisfactory conclusion. A novelist, writing in a recent number of "The Athenæum," blames the cheap magazine and the immense welter of books that are poured forth, while a critic, in a letter to the same journal, thinks that some share of the evil is due to the reviewers. All three causes have helped to lower the level of English fiction. The cheap magazine, with its demands for crude sensationalism, has ousted more serious work; the excessive number of novels published makes it easier for talent to escape notice; and criticism, which, as the "Athenæum" writer puts it, has now become largely a matter of deft adjectives, is often incompetent and sometimes biassed. The main evil is that too many books are published, and that, in making a choice, readers often depend on the advice tendered them by the circulating libraries. These naturally look only to the commercial side of the books they handle, and all other considerations fall into the background. The first step towards improvement will be taken when people buy books instead of borrowing them, and it is just possible that the attempt of the libraries to make themselves censors of literature may enable the publishers to succeed in their effort to reduce the standard price of novels. In this connection Messrs. Nelson's enterprise deserves notice. Their series of two-shilling novels, which will shortly make its appearance, includes books by Mr. J. C. Snaith, Mr. H. G. Wells, Mr. George Birmingham, Mr. Anthony Hope, Mr. H. A. Vachell, and other writers of distinction.

THE Cambridge University Press announce for immediate publication "Hungary in the Eighteenth Century," by Professor Marczali, with an introductory essay on earlier Hungarian history by Mr. H. W. V. Temperley, Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge. The author is Professor of History in the University of Budapest, and has been described as "the most impartial of Magyar historians." His work is based on numerous official documents and records, and also on the archives of private families. It has long been well known on the Continent as the classical work on this subject, and forms an indispensable preliminary to the study of modern Hungarian history and politics. The translation has been made by Dr. A. B. Yolland, Professor in the University of Budapest.

MR. FIFIELD has in the press a new edition of Samuel Butler's "Unconscious Memory," which has been out of print for several years. The book is a development of the theory laid down in "Life and Habit," and the new issue will contain an introduction by Professor Hartog upon Butler's scientific views.

* * *

WE understand that Mr. Thomas Seccombe is preparing a collection of literary essays for publication in the early autumn. "The Night Watchman" is to be the title of the volume, and Mr. Seccombe's freshness of treatment and comprehensive knowledge of English and French literature lead us to expect a book of uncommon interest.

* * *

WITHIN the next few weeks Messrs. Harrap will issue "An Introduction to the Study of Literature," by Professor W. H. Hudson. The aim of the book, which is intended for the general reader as well as for students, is to treat of critical methods in popular fashion and to enable his readers to approach books with more discrimination, and, as a consequence, to gain a higher pleasure from their reading. Professor Hudson does not confuse the study of literature with the study of rhetoric, and holds the view that "good reading is better than all scholarship, and the cultivation of the art of good reading infinitely more important than all the acquisitions of scholastic learning." Mr. Arnold Bennett has written a book on similar lines, but there ought to be a public for Professor Hudson's manual, which is the result of several years' experience as a University Extension Lecturer.

A COURSE of three lectures on "The Theatre," "Contemporary Poetry," and "The Intellectual Movement in Ireland," will be given by Mr. W. B. Yeats, at No. 1, Old Burlington Street, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of next week.

AMONG Mr. Heinemann's spring announcements are "The Memoirs of Heinrich Heine," an English rendering of the mosaic made out of Heine's writings—chiefly the letters—by Karpeles, and published by him as "Heine's Autobiographie"; the second and third volumes of "The Memoirs of the Duchesse de Dino," edited by the Princess Radziwill; and a translation of M. Lenotre's "A Gascon Royalist in Revolutionary Paris." The latter volume is an account of the Baron de Batz, mainly based on documents discovered by M. Lenotre, and giving a dramatic picture of Paris at the time of the Revolution.

THE YOUNG GAMBETTA.*

AFTER the death of Gambetta, his father was asked to allow the body of his son to be buried in Paris. "You had him while he was alive," was the bitter reply; "now that he is dead, worn out by your politics, I wish to have him. He shall rest in the little cemetery of Nice, whither his mother preceded him. I do not wish his grave to be desecrated in the future." This fascinating volume of family letters reveals, in most attractive intimacy, the affections and simplicities of the great statesman and orator. Perhaps the real hero of them is that stern old father who could send so defiant a message to the French people. A little shop-keeper of a provincial Southern town, "not exactly a good man of business," "he did not strike his neighbors as being either very intelligent or very prudent." Scarcely a word of his correspondence appears in these letters; almost alone, a comment on another's folly—"He has bought his experience in the fashionable world; and as truth is not found there, he might be sometimes mistaken!" Here are only the replies, with frequent and sometimes passionate remonstrances from the son in Paris, against frequent reproaches and condemnations. It is always "You"—the world outside—especially the wild, agitated, unstable world of the city—which is the subject of contempt. That world is leading the son into debt, into café-haunting oratory, into wild, unappeasable ambitions. Later, it is feeling the need of him: it has fallen into the madness of unforeseen war, into the greatest secular calamity that has ever come to the nation. He alone can save you: he will re-establish Civil Government, and lay the foundation of the Republic. He will wrestle with principalities and powers in one long, unquenchable struggle against the cowardice and jealousies and stupidities of the time. At length he will fall, before half the journey is over, worn out by a task too heavy for human hands. "Your politics" have done it, cries the fierce old man at the last: you who kill the prophets and garnish their sepulchres and subsequently violate even these last resting places of those who have served you. Let him rest by the seas far away from you—from your mad fever-world. "I do not wish his grave to be desecrated at the last."

Such was one of the parents: an Italian of a race of Ligurian sailors, who married a French girl from the South, from which union of races sprang Léon Gambetta, that volcanic energy which flamed for twelve years across the history of France. He was born in 1838; he was brought up in comparative poverty: educated at the seminary of Montfaucon, and later at the Lycée of Cahors. In this volume there are many child letters, written from school, little distinguished, but already revealing ardent family affection, and already also the sentiments of a youthful Republican. He persuaded his father to send him to Paris to study law; and he first appears there, in the life which has meant so much for France—the life which has given to France all her greatest things. It is generally near the attics of one of those tall white houses, with a glimpse of the sky and perhaps of the river from the window; poorly furnished, with little outward adornment. And here a young man is living with bed only for warmth in winter, on the minimum of bodily sustenance, supported mainly by the high resolve of youth—to conquer Paris or die. So the youth of genius have been sucked into the capital from remote and tranquil provincial cities; driven there by the "large unrest which made them do it;" Balzac and Taine from the garden of Touraine, Renan from Brittany, Zola and Gambetta from the South, each carrying some memory of pleasant sunlit lands outside, to console them for privation and loneliness in the obscurity of the still unconquered city. "Here we have a room thirteen feet square," writes Gambetta to his father, "ornamented with a clock that never goes and never has gone; a chest of drawers, the drawers of which can only be opened with the greatest difficulty; an armchair which was once crimson and soft, and is now colorless and hard; a bed which is fairly good, for when I lie down upon it I am usually very sleepy; a grate in which I never make a fire, because I can't afford it." A drawback is the semi-darkness. "The sun which Paris ever sees during three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, does not peep in to wish me good morning!" Breakfast consists of one roll, value one sou; lunch, a glass of water; five o'clock dinner, 17, 18, or 20 sous; supper another one-sou roll, sopped in water. Memories are continually haunting, of Cahors, with the tall poplars shading a green distance; of the smell of the perfumed banks of the river; of family meals, almost intolerable to think of in the fireless desolation of a one-sou supper: "You all seated round the soup, one adding pepper, the other sprinkling cheese, while behind your back you hear the cheerful sound, especially comforting on a cold winter evening, of a real old-fashioned fire, before which a fowl is roasting—would to God I could smell it." Yet the student in the tall house at Paris is sustained by that undying hope and ambition, which have comforted so many who have succeeded—so many, also, who have failed. He encourages himself with epigrammatic wisdom: with the saying of Charles V., "Fortune is so fickle, and especially so in her treatment of young men"; with Napoleon the Third's epigram—"One can master fate by work, and force the future to obey one if that work is performed in an intelligent manner." He has hopes of personal attainment. He cherishes dreams of a wonderful future for the world. It is the dream of youth, not yet disenchanted, seeing—as it seems—how easily and quickly this world can be transformed into a place of Paradise for the children of men. "We must succeed," he declares. "Our opinions are the daughters of a painful past; they are big with a promising future; they must eventually give birth to the happiness of mankind. But first they must be developed by study. Education must widen their knowledge. Men must make them know, and everyone must respect and honor them." "You smile," he concludes. "I am too impetuous. It is true. But the people suffer so, that I may be excused if my feelings are sometimes too much for me."

Meanwhile he is miserably poor: driven to get into debt, and finding his father torturing him with silence—worse, for such a temperament, than open reproaches—he is himself compelled to apply for sundry mean sums required for renewed solvency. Rumors travel also to the far South—spreading readily, here as always, because malicious—of his café-haunting habits, of his noisy rhetoric, of a life generally irregular and uncontrolled. Passionate always, he is passionate in repudiation of these charges: always pleading, without a word of reproach, with this stern old man who despised all the doings of that city of Vanity. Sociable, unassuming, with the quick power of making friends, he was becoming celebrated in the Quartier: carousing—on the smallest of sums—in a feast of rhetorical and political extravagances. Nothing could wear out that indefatigable energy, which on the world arena was later to astonish the world. "Very strong and very fearless, the young orator sometimes provoked noisy disturbances, in which he made himself dreaded on account of his tremendous strength. It sometimes happened about this time that he would smash a marble-topped table with one blow of his fist; but the state of his funds prevented him indulging too often in this expensive pastime; in fact, he only repeated this operation when, having won at écarté, at which game he fancied himself an adept, he could afford to do so." So youth has rioted always, confident in itself and in the future; so old age has looked on with cold disapproval, seeing here nothing but the beginnings of a wasted life. One can read between the lines of this one-sided correspondence, the frequent exhortations. "I know," he writes, "I must persevere, be orderly, even more orderly: as you say very rightly, and as I myself feel, I need to be more orderly in my habits." His health began to fail at this time, when he was only twenty years old. He was utterly careless of himself, he allowed his injured eye to cause him acute sufferings before it was finally removed; throat troubles commenced, which continued to the end. On the other hand, he was now at the summit of that extraordinary popularity which made him the students' hero. They hailed him as the Hercules of the Republic, and the Destroyer of the Empire; they applauded his wild and violent harangues: they would have followed him anywhere, to do anything.

* "Gambetta: Life and Letters." By P. B. Gheusi. Authorised translation by Violette M. Montagu. T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

"He fell like a bomb upon Paris," says Léon Cladel. "I can see him with his leonine mane, his bloodshot eye bulging far out of its socket: I can still hear him roaring forth his fiery apostrophes against the César de contrebande whom he was to succeed in some measure. Yes, in spite of his sloppy, badly made clothes, evidently made by a provincial tailor, he looked a splendid fellow. I can remember how the poet, Gustave Mathieu, having met him somewhere about town one day, with his collar flying and his coat all unbuttoned, came up to us still half deafened by the future tribune's animal-like roarings, crying, 'We've got another Jupiter! So much the worse for M. Vêto! Mirabeau has come to life again!'"

So he gradually struggles into manhood: with this outward disturbance, with a soul underneath it, as these letters show, passionate indeed in affection, but loving nature and his family, frugal, austere in living, grateful for human kindness. He is tired even as Deputy: continually demanding an impossible rest. Rest could only come to him with the grave. What he would have done had the great catastrophe not happened, it is impossible to conjecture. That he would have essayed violence is certain: that violence might have left him incompletely memorable as one of "twenty-four leaders of Revolution." But the challenge of the war, with its dominant demand for some tremendous and elemental force, in the midst of the wrecking of a whole stable society, found in him the one man adequate. Henceforth his life is the life of the young Republic, created in the main (as M. Hanotaux has affirmed) through his unquenchable energy. The old home affections continue, but letters become scarcer. A new star had arisen, Mme. Léon, upon whom he poured out all the passion of his soul, laying at her feet the whole-hearted devotion of one of the stormiest spirits which ever have animated human clay.

These letters will stand as some of the great love letters of the world. Those reserved for the old family home retain something of the undimmed affection of child for parent, in the years which bring tranquillity and serene old age to the one, to the other only endless labors in a task beyond men's endurance. "Alas, I am overwhelmed with work: the task is killing me," is the cry of one who felt often "an implacable need for rest." "I am beginning to feel a little better, but I am still in great need of rest, and especially silence," he writes in 1878. Three years afterwards, "I am confident that I shall soon confound all my enemies," is his hope, "and that I shall at last be able to take a few weeks' rest." Early in 1882—he was to die on the last day of that year—"from time to time I throw a glance athwart the terrible life which I am now leading, towards my home, and I dream that some day I shall be able to enjoy a well-earned rest." "I embrace you both a thousand thousand times," he writes to his old father and mother, "and remain for life the son who loves you." It is the year of his short-lived administration: the Ministry of All-the-Talents, which ended in hopeless collapse. His mother dies while he is making speeches from the tribune. Happiness at the end seemed within his grasp. Mme. Léon, after his political "fall," consented to be his wife. They were settling down in Balzac's "little Les Jardies," when an illness, to-day easily curable by a simple operation, suddenly silenced this astonishing and fiery spirit. He was buried in the Nice which is "at once the cradle of Garibaldi and the grave of Gambetta," the two men who more than any other, in the Europe which followed the Revolution, had revealed the absurdity of the use of the word "impossible" in human affairs.

ORDERS AND UNITY.*

HIGH Churchman as he is, the Bishop of Birmingham represents what must be regarded as a Via Media: he is suspect with the extremists of his own side. "Lux Mundi" was the Trojan horse of Anglican orthodoxy; and the treatise on "The Body of Christ" excited misgivings in the ranks of Sacerdotalists which are not yet allayed. To this must be added his attitude towards Disestablishment, and in general towards social questions. Were the hypothesis of double personality admissible, we might see in him a Mr. Hyde and a Dr. Jekyll, a medieval and a modern man. It is possible that one of these will master the other; it is perhaps more probable that the conflict will remain unsolved. In either case, its presence gives a certain unexpectedness to utterances weighty both in themselves and by reason of the personality behind them. It is certain that what the Bishop says will be worth hearing; but it is never quite certain what he will say.

It is safe to prophesy that "Orders and Unity" will meet with a reception similar to that given to the works mentioned. It will neither satisfy those who think with Lord Halifax, nor be endorsed by scientific theologians. For the former it is at once too scholarly and too spiritual. "We can accept Dr. Lindsay's theory of origins," and, "to deny God's presence with them—the Protestant Churches—and His co-operation in their work and ministry, would seem to me to approach blasphemy against the Holy Ghost." On the other hand the episcopate is "an essential constituent of Christianity," "the necessary and divinely given link of continuity and cohesion in the Church universal." The two positions lie side by side unmediated. One or other, not both, can be maintained.

From the point of view of an English churchman, Bishop Gore's theory of episcopacy—it is the theory now, it must be admitted, in fashion—is of political rather than religious or theological significance. It was foreign to the reformers of the Tudor and to the theologians of the Stuart period. Orders, says Article 25, is "not to be counted a sacrament of the Gospel"; it has grown of "the corrupt following of the Apostles." The conditions of the ministry laid down in Article 23 are fulfilled in the non-episcopal churches; Article 36 affirms no more of the Ordinal "set forth in the time of Edward VI., and confirmed at the same time by authority of Parliament" than that it "doth contain all things necessary to such Consecration and Ordering (this against Rome), neither (as against the Puritans) hath it anything that of itself is superstitious and ungodly." This, it should be remembered, was the contention of Hooker. He argued not that episcopacy was necessary either to a true Church or a valid ministry, but that it was not unlawful, not a thing beyond the competence of a Church to accept and impose. So sound a churchman as Usher writes that "for the testifying my communion with those Churches (which I do love and honor as true members of the Church Universal) I do profess that with like affection I should receive the blessed sacrament at the hands of the Dutch ministers if I were in Holland, as I should do at the hands of the French ministers if I were at Charenton." The idea that the retention of the episcopal form of church government placed the Church of England on a different level from that of the foreign reformed churches was repudiated; Bancroft in 1610 refused to re-ordain Spottiswood and his colleagues, maintaining that "thereof there was no necessity, seeing where bishops could not be had the ordination given by presbyters must be esteemed lawful, otherwise it might be doubted if there were any lawful vocation in most of the reformed Churches." And the Act of Uniformity recognises the orders of non-episcopal churches by the provision that "the penalties in this Act shall not extend to foreigners or aliens of the foreign reformed Churches allowed, or to be allowed, by the King's majesty, his heirs and successors in England." In the future, Canon Henson reminds us, it was to be possible for non-episcopalians to hold preferment in the Church of England, "as Bucer, Peter Martyr, Saravia, Casaubon, and many others had done at an earlier period." Till Tractarianism, the view of the episcopate put forward by Bishop Gore was sporadic in the Church of England: if it has become endemic, it is because, on the one hand, the Oxford divines found it a short and easy method of dealing with dissent and Romanism, and, on the other, their knowledge was too uncritical to enable them to discern the weakness of the foundation on which it was built. The weapon was at once needless and ineffectual. To take a strong line against dissent it is not necessary (as the example of the Church of Scotland shows) to fall back upon sacerdotalism; the separatist temper—it is an open question whether it is more dominant in free than in established churches—is, as such, to be condemned. While history deals conclusively with the Roman attitude towards English orders, the controversialists who accept it are cutting away the branch on which they sit.

Birmingham boasts of two bishops, an Anglican and a Roman. If a wise man is asked whether either of these ecclesiastics can trace his spiritual ancestry to the Apostles by an unbroken series of episcopal ordinations, he will answer that it is exceedingly improbable; and that to suppose that any spiritual power is attached to such a succession is a pagan, not a Christian, idea. But the claim of the latter to regard the former as a "mere layman" admits of an easy reply. Nothing took place at the Reformation to break any succession which then existed, or to cause the English clergy to forfeit any power which this succession, such as it was, conveyed. And for this conclusive reason. The Reformation in this country was carried through not by divines—otherwise the English Church would almost certainly have been modelled on that of Geneva—but by statesmen whose purpose was, for political motives, to make the nation and the Church co-extensive. This purpose would have been effectually frustrated had a breach with the historical ministry been brought about. It can scarcely be supposed that the counsellors of Queen Elizabeth attached much value to Apostolical succession as such; but it was so necessary for them, on political grounds, to preserve it, that it is impossible to doubt that it was preserved. Any succession, therefore, which the Roman clergy possess, the English clergy possess equally; nor is any power which we may conceive as attached to this succession wanting to the English Church of our own day.

Bishop Gore treats the question from a larger standpoint than the Anglican. He is too scholarly to overlook, and too sincere to dissimulate, the facts brought out by such writers as Lightfoot, Hatch, Sohm, and Lindsay: yet only by such means as these, it seems to us, can his conclusions be reached; another view of the matter is indicated by the premises which he admits. That Christianity is not individualistic; that it was conceived by its Founder and His followers as social; that, not indeed a priesthood, but a ministry was part of its conception; that, imminent as the Parousia was believed to be, the work of evangelisation was to be carried on till the Master's coming—all this is true. But the writer's keen spiritual sense is hampered by, and in unconscious conflict with, a conception of Christianity which is not spiritual, as his learning struggles with a reading of history which is not historical.

Principal Lindsay's suggestive analogy between the Church of the first age and the missionary communities of our own day is the key to much of the history of ecclesiastical organisation, and meets the objections raised by the Bishop to the view commonly held by Protestant scholars with regard to the development of the official out of the charismatic ministry. In India, he writes:—

"One seemed to be transported back to the early centuries, and to see what the earliest writers had recounted and described. Portions of the 'Didache,' of the 'Apostolic Canons,' of the 'Canons of Hippolytus' were living practices there."

Bishop Gore's view, it seems to us, is one from which the growth of knowledge, of morality, and of the religious sense have led, and are leading, men surely, and no longer slowly, away. It is certain that the world is not going back to it; to insist on it is to widen the already too threatening gulf between the clerical and the lay mind. If the former is right, the consequence, grave as it is, must be accepted. But before theologians incur it, let them be certain that it must of necessity be incurred.

SIERRA LEONE.*

To speak with authority, and not as the tourists, is the best qualification for the author of any book on a foreign land, provided that he speaks at all. That is where the trouble often comes in. To the old resident the scene has become so familiar that he does not see it, or his knowledge has become so minute that he cannot tell it. So it happens that the hurrying tourist often gives us the best picture of little-visited countries, because he sees and says everything with the freshness of ignorance and unfamiliarity. But, after all, the man who knows is best, provided, as we said, that he is not blind or dumb. And certainly Mr. Alldridge is neither. If this excellent account of Sierra Leone has a fault, it is that, especially in the earlier chapters, almost too much is seen and told. There are pages that read like the diary of an enthusiastic young lady who has taken a trip to "the Coast" and sees a black race for the first time. Yet, behind every word, Mr. Alldridge sets the experience of nearly forty years.

For nearly forty years he has played his part in that Crown Colony of evil repute. As Travelling Commissioner and District Commissioner, he has guided its fortunes and watched its progress since 1871; and now, as he passes the years in review, his verdict on the result is that all is very good. Not quite all, perhaps. Like everyone else who visits the West Coast or penetrates into the basin of the Niger, he laments the decay of the best native arts under competition with European imports. You still may find the beautiful fabrics ornamented with native stripes and patterns, and colored with immutable dyes—such fabrics as the red-walled city of Kano used to produce in immense abundance, and still produces—but it is a vanishing industry. The cheap and flimsy hideousness of Lancashire and Germany is fast driving it out, and in a few years it will be extinct, as the fine muslin of Eastern Bengal, similarly exterminated in the name of the trade that follows the flag. So it is that our Imperial possessions always lose the skill, the art, the sense of beauty that long ages of their separate life have evolved in them, and tend to become mere fields for producing the raw materials for our ugly and worthless goods.

Mr. Alldridge is quite aware of the loss, but he does not dwell too much upon it. We take him to be a man of happy and sanguine disposition (he has even a good word for gramophones), and what he enjoys narrating is the real progress of the Colony in the ways of peace and good order—the railway, the hospital, the law courts, the food supply, and, above all, the increasing production of palm oil and kernels, which form the broad basis of trade in Sierra Leone, as in all our West Coast Colonies. He never tires of extolling the remarkable advances along these lines since his first arrival, and he foretells all manner of possible developments, such as the growth of cocoa, lately introduced on the Gold Coast with a success that proves it can be cultivated perfectly well by free African labor, in place of the slavery of San Thomé.

Equally from this volume and his previous work on "The Sherbro and its Hinterland," which has for some years been a classic for "the Coast," we form an opinion of the author as the best type of British official in savage lands—kindly and sympathetic, watching the interests of the natives at least as carefully as his own country's, a little heavy, perhaps, and slow in imagination, but scrupulous in details, and honest above suspicion. It is a high character for governing officials to bear, and it remains the only chance, the only excuse, for an Empire's continuance. For the author of a book like this it is the best recommendation, and the whole account is written with peculiar modesty, carefulness of knowledge, and an intimate acquaintance with the native mind that can only come with sympathy.

Except for traders and governors, the most interesting part of the volume will certainly be the chapters dealing with native customs and beliefs. All such things are, no doubt, slowly changing, slowly disappearing, though they seem likely long to survive the native arts and industries. But up to now they have not altered much, and it is very noticeable what a close resemblance in certain customs persists over nearly the whole of Africa. The present writer, for instance, when in West Central Africa, some distance south of the Equator, has come upon rites of initiation for boys and girls very nearly the same as the ceremonies here described in Sierra Leone, and a similar ritual is to be found in Mozambique and the East Central Coast. Yet wide divisions of race, as well as of space, lie between the tribes, and if there is a common origin for the rites, it must be very remote. It may be said that, after all, the initiation of boys and girls at a certain age is a very natural ceremony, and likely to be universal; we ourselves, in fact, retain a strictly religious form of it in Confirmation; the Romans retained a political or social form in the assumption of man's dress. That may be so, though it is strange that the Bundu and Poro (girls' and boys' mysteries) should everywhere be accompanied by almost exactly the same secretion in forests for weeks together, ecstatic dancing, and in most cases, we believe, by the painting of the body in stripes and the mummery of imitation devils. The devils, however, are certainly most at home on the West Coast, and in that congenial atmosphere we may leave them. As to the game called "Warre" in Sierra Leone—a simple mixture of backgammon and "Archer Up"—we do not know how to account for its prevalence through nearly the whole continent, unless, like drink, it is too fascinating to remain hidden from the native mind.

All the extraordinary conglomeration of symbolism and cruel nonsense that we class as Fetishism still remains almost unaltered throughout the Coast and its Hinterland.

"Fetish," says Mr. Alldridge, "is still the most powerful agency at work in this part of Africa. Whether civilising influences will ever be able to dig down to the tap-root is one of the complex problems which only the future can solve; at present Pagan and Mohammedan are alike enslaved by it, and even when the native professes Christianity it is very difficult for him to shake himself free from its subtle and all-pervading influence."

It was to maintain the horrible Fetish medicine, called Bofimor, prepared from human fat, that the society of "Human Leopards" was inaugurated about twenty years ago. But we are surprised to learn that, in spite of the efforts at the end of last century, described in the author's former book, the society still exists, and from time to time one of its members, disguised in leopard skins, leaps unexpectedly upon a victim, causing instant death by plunging a three-pronged knife into the back of the neck. In this admirable account of one of the least known, but most interesting, of our native colonies, the author displays his minute and careful knowledge of much that is almost equally strange alike in the habits of animals and men.

QUEEN ELIZABETH AS A GIRL.*

MR. MUMBY has made a popular and attractive book by putting together practically all the extant letters written by, to, or concerning Queen Elizabeth during the first twenty-five years of her life. The subject is perennially interesting, for no English queen exercised so great a personal influence upon English history, or possessed a character so strong and yet so subtle. She was unique in other respects; no English sovereign had so severe an apprenticeship, or served a term behind the Traitor's Gate before being elevated to the throne. From her earliest years she had to wear a mask, and the habit clung to her through life, and even these letters do not enable us to pierce the disguises which shrouded the development of her mind. There is some approach to frankness in the letters here reprinted from Miss Strickland, who translated them from Gregorio Leti's "Life of Queen Elizabeth"; but Mr. Rait is too cautious when in his introduction he merely states that "they cannot be accepted without reserve." Leti was a prolific scribbler, who lived in the latter half of the seventeenth century, wrote books as numerous as the years he lived, and made no pretence to historical scholarship. He garnished his romances with letters containing not what his heroes and heroines wrote, but what he thought they would have been likely to write under the circumstances; and his critical apparatus provided inadequate checks on the flight of his imagination.

Thus, when Elizabeth was not yet four years old, he ascribes to her a letter written to Queen Jane Seymour on July 31st, 1537, in which the child is made to say:—

"I am under great obligation to the King, my father, for so often giving me news of your health, but if he should forget to inform me I should not take it ill, provided he will let me hear from time to time of the child who is so soon to be born to him. If I should be there when he comes into the world, I do not know how I should keep myself from giving him a good beating in revenge for the pain he has made you suffer!"

The ingenious Leti has apparently transformed a letter actually written by Elizabeth to Catherine Parr in 1548, but only dated July 31st, into one written to Jane Seymour eleven years earlier. Most of Leti's productions have even less historical foundation; in one of them he makes Elizabeth say that she only heard of Philip's marriage with Mary

"several months" after it had taken place; and the love letters of Elizabeth and Courtenay are palpable forgeries. We should therefore translate Mr. Rait's caution that these letters "cannot be accepted without reserve" into an admonition to reject them without hesitation.

Another of Mr. Rait's warnings, i.e., that relating to the defects in the calendars of State Papers (p. xx.), has been somewhat ignored by Mr. Mumby, for he reproduces letters from the calendars even when the full text is accessible in print; for example, in the Spanish "Documentos Inéditos," or in Kervyn de Lettenhove's "Relations Politiques des Pays-Bas et de l'Angleterre"; while others are given from Froude's version of the "Granville Papers," although those papers have been printed and are to be found in many libraries. Nor have the original MSS. in the British Museum, Record Office, or Bodleian been used to any extent, the letters being almost invariably reprinted from previously published texts. On the other hand, Mr. Mumby has done good service by reproducing the neglected "Bedingfield Papers," the most important source for Elizabeth's history under Queen Mary; and it is convenient to have all the materials collected in a handy volume.

They do not, as we have said, solve the problems of Elizabeth's youth. The extent to which she was compromised with Protector Somerset's brother, the Lord High Admiral; the reasons why Lady Jane Grey and not Elizabeth was chosen as Northumberland's tool; the exact relations between Elizabeth and Courtenay; her complicity in Wyatt's plots; and her attitude towards religious doctrine, all remain obscure. Mr. Mumby quotes, but does not discuss the provenance of, Elizabeth's well-known quatrain on the subject of the Mass:—

Christ was the word that spake it:
He took the bread and brake it;
And what His word did make it
That I believe and take it.

It was a clever subterfuge, characteristic of Elizabeth; and we stand in respectful amazement at Bishop Creighton's comment, which Mr. Mumby quotes: "It was a saying, the theological truth of which has become more apparent as controversy on the point has progressed." The theological truth of a statement which may mean anything or nothing is, of course, indisputable; and no politician has excelled Elizabeth in the invaluable capacity for framing non-committal phrases.

MR. CHESTERTON'S LATEST NOVEL.*

HEROIC farce—extravagant, grotesque, eloquent, frantic sometimes in its appearance of lunacy, sometimes in its appearance of a certain sanity, judging and condemning the madness of mankind—such is Mr. Chesterton's latest exploit in the realms of fiction. "The Ball and the Cross" contains many chapters of striking symbolism, mingled with chapters of symbolism whose meaning altogether defies the reader. It comprehends in many conversations much of the Chestertonian philosophy—his passionate affection for certain old elemental things, his passionate hatred of certain would-be teachers of mankind. Dreams and miracles follow each other across the stage. The last scene ends in the conflagration of a gigantic asylum, in which most of the characters of the story have been incarcerated owing to a veracity which appears pathological to the world outside. The irrelevance and confusion resembles one of Mr. Bernard Shaw's later plays. The difference is in action. In Mr. Shaw's play the characters talk and nothing happens. In Mr. Chesterton's fantasy everything happens—and the characters go on talking. In a wild manhunt across England and the Channel Islands, with hairbreadth escapes from the police, motor adventures, yachting adventures, and every form of exhilarating new Arabian night adventures in secure suburban or rural byeways, the chief characters carry on a perpetual dialogue as to the existence of God or the meaning of the Universe. The whole book—baffling as much of it is—holds the attention of the reader. In texture much of it is perfect. Mr. Chesterton scatters with a liberal hand—"like wealthy men who care not how they give." In the midst of the whirlwind and riot of farce, he will set descriptions of scenery, dawns and sunsets, a touch of character, the picture of a woman's face, in which "anything that was heavy in all this was abruptly lightened by two large light china-blue eyes, lightened all of a sudden, as if it had been lifted into the air by two big butterflies." And the critic feels a sense of exasperation against a genius which sprawls itself away in so impossible a medley of suggestion and extravagance and fantasy, for lack of a control which might create a work of permanent appeal.

There is a huge sense of jollity in the writing of it, and that jollity carries the reader through to the end. All Mr. Chesterton's favorite affirmations are here propounded, and most of them, at least for the moment, convincingly. The glory of the sum of things and of every separate particle of them, the superiority of effort over attainment, the blindness and madness of all atheisms and life denials, the essential insanity of much that calls itself "modern"—from Tolstoians who condemn Combat for any causes, to stoutish sedentary writers who gobble oysters and demand Blood—all these, the subject of not unfrequent essays, help to form material for these endless conversations. Professor Lucifer as "incarnate evil" appears at the beginning on a flying ship sailing over St. Paul's Cathedral. He is a kind of combination of rationalist and scientist—the spirit of the scientist-socialist organised millenium of the days to come. He is armed with tools—"the ancient human tools gone mad, grown into unrecognisable shapes, forgetful of their origin, forgetful of their names." His passenger is an old monk, fished up with a lasso out of a back garden in Western Bulgaria. In a fog the airship strikes St. Paul's Cathedral. Lucifer, enraged at Michael's arguments, hurls him out on the cross above the ball. The monk sets himself "to climb up into a star," and is promptly arrested and spirited away to the lunatic asylum where all the characters gather at the last.

Immediately, to the shop window of "The Atheist" at Ludgate Hill, decorated with pictorial blasphemies with which everyone had become bored, there comes the one man in Britain who believed. Brought up as a strict Roman Catholic and Jacobite in the Western Highlands, Evan Maclan saw the things as illusion which most men thought real, the things as real which most men could never see at all.

"On that fantastic fringe of the Gaelic land where he walked as a boy, the cliffs were as fantastic as the clouds. Heaven seemed to humble itself and come closer to earth. The common paths of his little village began to climb quite suddenly and seemed resolved to go to heaven. The sky seemed to fall down towards the hills; the hills took hold upon the sky. In the sumptuous sunset of gold and purple and peacock green, cloudlets and islets were the same. Evan . . . understood the supernatural before he understood the natural. He had looked at dim angels standing knee-deep in the grass before he looked at the grass. He knew that Our Lady's robes were blue before he knew the wild roses round her feet were red. All through his life he thought of the daylight world as a sort of divine debris, the broken remainder of his first vision."

Seeing with a fury of amazement some insult to the Mother of God in the Atheist's shop-window, he smashes the glass. The only man who whole-heartedly believes, finds himself confronted with the only man who whole-heartedly denies. In the rest of the book they are making frantic efforts to fight out the eternal quarrel against the organised opposition of a fat, contented civilisation, which desires nothing less than the revival of the ancient elemental challenge about ultimate things. After repeated astonishing escapes, the two duellists find themselves safely inside the lunatic asylum; where the Jacobite is confronted with one lunatic who announces himself as Edward VII., and immediately attacks him as a usurper: while the Atheist makes a frantic impeachment of the handiwork of the Deity to a lunatic who calls himself God. Committed on account of their fundamental sanity to the lowest dungeons of the asylum—clean polished cells, where everything is performed by machinery: the kind of spiritual universe to which the world of the future would naturally commit anything so irrational as the affirmation of belief or disbelief—they discover here Michael the monk, buried alive, an "idiot," the wisest and happiest man on earth.

In the end the lunatic asylum is consumed by fire. An attempt is made to rescue the "idiot" in the cell at the bottom of it. "Fool, come out and save yourself," calls out the Atheist. "Father," cries the believer, "come out and save us all." Then comes the miracle. The forest of flames slopes, one side towards the inland heights, one towards the sea. "As the echoes of Evan's last appeal rang and died in the universal uproar, the fiery vault over his head opened down the middle, and reeling back in two great golden billows, hung on each side as huge and harmless as two sloping hills lie on each side of a valley. Down the centre of this trough or chasm a little path ran, cleared of all but ashes. And down this little path was walking a little old man, singing as if he were alone in a wood in spring."

They kneel as he goes; but no one sees his face. The flames flare to heaven, catch Lucifer's disappearing airship, send the bodies of the doctors who had escaped with him crashing into the fire. "They are not lost," says Evan; "they are saved. He has taken away no souls with him, after all." And "there among the ashes lay two shining things that had survived the fire, his sword and Turnbull's, fallen haphazard in the pattern of a Cross."

So—in a vision of mystery difficult of interpretation—ends this extraordinary work. Earlier in the volume Lucifer had shown each of the combatants in a dream a vision of his heart's desire. Evan sees the revival of the old age of religious chivalry in London: "the Kings have come back to us"; the dome and the Cross of St. Paul's are guarded by a triple row of knights in armor; the ball has disappeared. But in the street below he sees a ruler on horseback, knighted and plumed, striking an old man with the flat of his sword. "Discipline for the whole society," says Lucifer, "is more important than justice to the individual"; and Evan knows that the vision is of the devil—not of God. Turnbull is borne to the future—to the accomplishment of the Revolution he desires. There is St. Paul's—with the ball still standing erect, the Cross stricken sideways. The reformer is exultant at the opening of "the last war of the world." But he finds East London being consumed in flames by the triumphant revolutionists. "Dr. Hertz has convinced everybody," says his guide, "that nothing can really be done with the real slums. His maxim has been adopted: 'No men should be unemployed. Employ the employables. Destroy the unemployables.' 'We are improving life by removing lives.' 'New lives for old. Good lives for bad.' And then Turnbull knew also that it was the devil who was speaking; and cursed him by the Gods in whom he disbelieved."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW" for March begins with two articles on the election, one by Mr. E. T. Cook and the other by Colonel D. C. Pedder. Mr. Cook gives statistical tables of the votes recorded in the elections, and argues in favor of the adoption by the Liberal Party of a scheme of reform of the House of Lords, and also for the necessity of making the Veto subsidiary to the Budget. Since Mr. Cook wrote, both these schemes have been overruled, to the great gain of the Liberal Party. Under the title of "Intensive Electioneering," Colonel Pedder speaks strongly of the pressure brought to bear on the voters during the election, especially in agricultural districts. His conclusion is that "money, position, and power can be used, and have been used, to construct an engine of compulsion which is practically irresistible. Its mechanism will be perfected by the experience of this election, and the next dissolution will find Tory organisation so complete as absolutely to defy opposition." Colonel Pedder argues that unless legislation is introduced to curb that power, the Liberal Party can only look forward to certain defeat. Mr. Laurence Jerrold describes the condition of Paris after the flood, and Mr. Ferdinand L. Leipnik discusses the nature of the Ottoman Empire. The German Press Bureau forms the subject of an article by Mr. G. V. Williams. Mr. Williams holds that such an organisation would be an anachronism in a country where newspapers kept abreast of the times, but he is of opinion that "there is no civilised country, except perhaps Austria, where the Press stands on so low a level, both socially and commercially, as in Germany." To the Government the Press Bureau is a valuable instrument, since it enables it to set the tone of public opinion, while the newspapers themselves are so poor that they cannot afford independent news-agencies. Mr. Williams's general verdict on the institution is that, despite some advantages, it is reactionary, and "a hindrance both to the ripening of the German to political maturity and to the advance of the Empire in modern political development." Dr. E. J. Dillon contributes his usual article on foreign affairs, laying stress this month upon the financial difficulties of the European Governments.

THE most interesting article in "The Fortnightly Review" bears the title "Black Bread and Blatchford," and is signed "Journalist." The writer is severe on the conduct of both political parties during the elections, though he admits that the Black Bread argument, if a mistake, was at least used by the friends of Free Trade from an undoubted desire "to defend a threatened position by means of irrefutable facts." As regards Mr. Blatchford's agitation, "Journalist" writes: "Mr. Blatchford's pamphlet is still in circulation, and is perhaps only at the beginning of its mischievous work. It is enough and to spare, however, for the present that Mr. Balfour, conceiving it necessary after some hesitation to toe Mr. Blatchford's line, has uttered at Hanley that masterpiece of equivocation, which has been received in Germany with something more uncomfortably like cool contempt than one could wish for the speeches of a British statesman; and that Lord Cromer, whose sense of justice and prudence has successfully made head for many years against an ingrained Teutophobia, has, by publicly praising Mr. Blatchford's work, damaged a reputation for statesmanship that was world-wide, and was almost as great in Germany as among ourselves." Mr. Sydney Brooks contributes a rather detached article on "Liberalism and the Crisis," laying stress on the dependence of the Government on the Irish vote. Mr. J. F. Macdonald writes in interesting style on "M. Edmond Rostand and 'Chantecler,'" and other noteworthy articles are "A Visit to Bohemia" by Mr. G. S. Street, "The Italian Circle at Holland House" by Miss Ethel M. de Foublanque, and "The Clergy and the Marriage Law," by Mr. Herbert Ives. The number contains a further instalment of Meredith's "Celt and Saxon."

APART from the Stock Exchange activity in rubber and oil, the attention of the City is still fixed upon our national finances. The Bank has decided to go on deducting income tax, in spite of the continued suspension of the Budget. But there is a general desire for regularisation; though no doubt individuals (especially those interested in breweries) would dearly like to see the Budget (or some of its parts) come to grief. I am told that our licensed traders have been threatening whisky distillers in Ireland with a boycott if the Irish Nationalists vote for the Budget. The story shows the desperate anxiety of the trade, for it must know that such a threat is worthless. Those who want Irish whisky will have it; and besides, Ireland offends less against the Trade than Scotland or Wales. For there are twenty Irish Unionists and ten Factionists from Ireland to vote against the Budget.

There has been some set back in rubber shares and rubber speculation this week and possibly the top of the boom has now been passed. But it is not a mere speculation bubble like so many of the manias and excitements which periodically visit the Stock Exchange, and carry even experienced members off their legs. The rubber boom is primarily caused by the fact that rubber consumption has advanced far more rapidly than rubber production in the last few years. If the price of rubber per lb. averages only half its present figure for the next few years, most of the honestly financed rubber plantations will pay good dividends. But then, of course, they are not all honestly or competently financed. Luckily, the rubber speculation has not been in the usual "carry over" style. Borrowing facilities have not been readily extended. In fact, the rubber boom has been largely in the nature of speculative investment. Although the Bank statement on Thursday revealed a much reduced reserve and was followed by a tightening of money rates, there is no sign of disquietude on the Stock Exchange. Evidently the nation is prosperous, and plenty of money is coming forward for investment. Home industries will get their share of attention when the rubber and oil booms have subsided. Speculation is rampant in the City. One authority told me that every City man he met was speculating in something or other. Everyone seems to be giving or receiving tips. The turf is neglected. Fine gentlemen and ladies are all engaged in small or great "flutters." In intervals of relaxation they find time to abuse the Government.

THE BUDGET.

Now that the supplementary estimates are in full swing and the magnitude of public waste upon armaments is becoming apparent, the necessity for Mr. Lloyd George's Budget is more urgent than ever. It is therefore highly satisfactory to learn from the Prime Minister that the Budget is to be introduced before the spring recess. Otherwise the arrears of Income tax and licence duties would be very difficult to collect. Mr. Gibson Bowles had suggested that the Income tax should be dealt with separately. But to have done this would have been a surrender of the modern principle of the Budget. The City was very full of Mr. Asquith's failure to pass the Budget, and the interest of the Tory journals and City editors was becoming quite remarkable. They are now in a great difficulty, unless they can persuade the Irish to throw over the best financial business that Ireland has ever been offered.

RUBBER SHARES AND RUBBER TRADES.

With prospectuses of small rubber plantation companies coming out at the rate of four or five a day, the probability that investors will be swindled right and left has become a certainty. No one, of course, ought to invest a penny in any new company of this sort unless he knows that the directors are both practical and honest men, and that they can be trusted to spend his money economically and efficiently. Under the best conditions it will be several years before one of the new companies can distribute a dividend. If I am any judge of City manias a crop of scandals will precede the crop of rubber. For any good and well-conducted company, however, the prospects are excellent, for rubber is proving a most valuable and even indispensable raw material in countless modern industries. Its uses are rapidly multiplying, and it is amazing that consumption continues on such a scale after the price has doubled. The way in which Free Trade England has grabbed and absorbed this most profitable of new industries (a veritable Rand) should give pause to those who mourn over the decadence of British enterprise. Since 1880 our imports of rubber have grown from 169,000 cwt. to over 700,000 cwt., of which nearly 400,000 are re-exported to all parts of the world. Liverpool and London are the two great rubber ports, rubber warehouses, and rubber marts. In the same period (since 1880) our manufactures of rubber have grown nearly fourfold; for in 1880 the home consumption of rubber was only 82,000 cwt., whereas now it amounts to over 300,000 cwt. Raw rubber, as everyone knows, is partly wild, partly tame. Most of the "wild" rubber comes from Brazil, most of the "tame" from the new British plantations in the Straits Settlements. But the proportion of "wild" to "tame" is still about ten to one. The biggest share in the consumption of rubber is now taken by tyres for motors, bicycles, and other vehicles, including perambulators. Then come rubber shoes and water-proofings of all kinds; then telegraph cables, belts, medical apparatus, elastics, and golf balls.

THE RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS

represent an attempt to reach the highest excellence attainable in modern typography. Set in the new fount designed by MR. HERBERT P. HORNE, and printed under the supervision of MR. CHARLES T. JACOBI, the books of this series will present many works of classic rank, in strictly limited editions, printed upon the finest handmade paper and upon vellum. The measure of success attained may be judged from the following representative opinions:—

The Burlington Magazine says of the Riccardi Fount that it is "fortunate in preserving the best qualities [of the Florentine original] while avoiding mannerisms." "The Daily News describes it as "a type that, in its brilliancy and finish, will be a joy to the bibliophile." "Superb type" is the opinion of the Guardian. The printed page, according to the Pall Mall Gazette, "is grace itself in the smoothness with which it reads and distinction of general appearance." "A beautiful setting that would have delighted William Morris," says the Illustrated London News.

The RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS

The First Books printed in the Riccardi Fount are:

THE STORY OF GRISELDA, FROM BOCCACCIO'S DECAMERON

In the translation of J. M. RIGG. 500 copies, 9½ × 6½, in paper wrappers, 5s. net, or bound in limp vellum, 12s. 6d. net.

THE SONG OF SONGS WHICH IS SOLOMON'S

In the Authorised Version. With 10 Plates after the Water-colour Drawings by W. RUSSELL FLINT. 500 copies 10½ × 7½, boards, canvas back and paper label, £2 2s. net; limp vellum, silk ties, £2 12s. 6d. net.

THE THOUGHTS OF THE EMPEROR MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS

Translated by GEORGE LONG. With 12 Plates after the Water-colour Drawings by W. RUSSELL FLINT. 500 copies (10½ × 7½), boards, £2 12s. 6d. net; limp vellum, £3 3s. net.

The plates in the above, reproduced in facsimile colours by the Medici Process, are commended by the Morning Post for "having touched the high-water mark of coloured illustration." "The drawings are all in that imaginative spirit of the past which marks Mr. Flint's best work, and the eye turns with new zest to the printed page after enjoying illustrations of such a sympathetic turn."—Pall Mall Gazette. "Mr. Flint has rendered the spirit of antiquity in a very striking manner."—Illustrated London News.

* * A Prospectus of the Riccardi Press Books, printed in the new fount, will be sent post free on application.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY

exists in order to issue facsimile Reproductions after the finest paintings of the Old Masters, IN THE COLOURS OF THE ORIGINALS, as rendered possible by the latest developments in scientific colour photography.

The process employed, while representing the Originals with marvellous fidelity, makes it possible to issue the prints at prices within the reach of all purses. All Medici Prints may be purchased singly, subject only to the prior claims of Annual Subscribers. The Burlington Magazine, Times, and all the leading journals may be quoted in support of The Society's contention that it has fulfilled both its pledges—to issue the best, at the lowest price.

Full Particulars of the ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION (£3), and of the ANNUAL ASSOCIATES' SUBSCRIPTION (also of £3), giving freedom of selection among New Plates for each year, will be found in the New Edition of The Society's Prospectus, NOW READY, post free 3d. stamps, or containing some 100 Reproductions of the Prints, post free 1s. stamps or P.O. Diary of the Week.

THE counter attack on the House of Commons, which the Unionist Party is organising as a set-off to the Liberal assault on the Veto, was opened on Friday week by Mr. Balfour in the City. He pronounced for a Senate—designed to remedy the great defect of the present House of Lords, which was that it lacked, not "efficiency," but "strength." "I do not want," said Mr. Balfour, "a better Second Chamber. I want a stronger Second Chamber." By some miracle of constructive ingenuity this body was not to "suck" virtue from the House of Commons, and yet was to be powerful enough to represent "not the passing mood of the people," but its "permanent wishes." He threatened that a future Tory Party would undo a Liberal restriction of the Veto, but confined his outline of methods to a hint that the new Chamber must be independent of the party machine and the party spirit.

ON Wednesday Lord Rosebery seconded the assault by giving notice of his reform resolutions which he is to move in Committee on Monday. They run as follows:—

(1) That a strong and efficient Second Chamber is not merely an integral part of the British Constitution, but necessary to the well-being of the State and the balance of Parliament.

(2) That a Second Chamber can best be obtained by reforming the House of Lords.

(3) That the necessary preliminary of such a reform and reconstitution is the acceptance of the principle that the possession of a peerage shall no longer in itself give the right to sit and vote in the House of Lords.

The last resolution may simply mean a mild extension of the principle of Representative Peers as it now obtains in Scotland and Ireland, not a wholesale clearance of "backwoodsmen." If this were contemplated, these gentlemen might show Lord Rosebery that a Lord was a Lord for a' that. But Lord Rosebery's legislative children are mostly short-lived, even if they do not perish in the birth-throe.

IN answer to these manœuvrings, the Government have taken a vigorous step for restoring the full power of the House of Commons over finance, and therefore over the Executive. Acting as "House of Commons men," even more directly than as Ministers, they have reverted to the old and proper practice of passing a Vote on Account for a short period, instead of for six months. This was the custom before 1896, when Mr. Balfour, who more than any statesman has weakened the House's control over the Executive, substituted for it votes which put the House at his mercy for the greater part of the Session.

THE Government now propose to give themselves (or their successors) a short run of supply, lasting from April 1st till the middle of May. The Chancellor properly made no secret as to the motive of this tactic. It ties every Government to the House of Commons, and will prevent Mr. Balfour, if he comes in, ruling by the House of Lords, independently of the body which alone has a right to make and unmake Ministries. "We do not think it expedient," said the Chancellor, "to invite the House of Commons at this stage to arm the Executive with funds that would make it practically independent of the House of Commons, as far as funds are concerned, for more than that very crucial period in its history." (i.e., the interval between April 1st and May 15th.)

* * *

THIS simple precaution, like every fresh reminder and penalty of the act of November 30, naturally drove the Opposition to fury, for it cripples their power to take office till the Commons get back their rights. Mr. Chamberlain, who in Mr. Balfour's unfortunate and we are afraid prolonged absence, acts for the leaderless, called it "a shabby game," the meaning of which was that the Government would leave a "financial morass" for their successors. "You and the Lords," retorted Mr. Bowles, "dugged the morass on advice from Birmingham, where they provide false gods for the heathen and false policies for British statesmen." Lord Hugh Cecil said this was the first instance of the Commons withholding Supply since the time of Charles I.—an ominous and quite apposite reference. Mr. Lloyd George again made the appropriate reply: The Government were only doing what Lord Hugh Cecil's father did, but they wanted to be rid of the financial interference of the Lords, and were determined that the Tories and their fellow-conspirators in the representative House should not do without the financial interference of the House of Commons.

ON Monday, Lord Lansdowne preferred a touching plea for the immediate resuscitation of the Budget which he killed last November. No doubt its rejection had put finance "out of joint," but as "reasonable and patriotic people" the Lords wanted to minimise the mischief. They thought only of the taxpayers. Unfortunately, the Government thought only of party. Why should not one part of the Budget be dealt with apart from the rest, and bits of it at least sent up to the House that was panting to pass it? Lord Lansdowne carefully refrained from pledging himself to support the Budget as it stood. To this Lord Crewe replied that if the Government attempted to cut up the Budget and thus destroy the Commons' control of it, their followers' chassepots would go off of themselves. The Lord Chancellor added that the financial trouble and the necessity of borrowing were "created wholly and solely by the unprecedented and, as I think, constitutionally unjustifiable interference of this House by throwing out the Budget of last year." Lord St. Aldwyn suggested the mild course that the Commons should pass resolutions legalising the collection of the income tax. But by the action of the Peers last November the validity of such resolutions has been destroyed.

THE Liberal Party has reason for grave concern in the Army and Navy Estimates. The first have reached £27,760,000, and show an increase over last year of £325,000. All this and more goes to the increased cost of the Territorials, whose establishment now stands at over 312,000, with an actual strength of 271,000. Mr. Haldane thanked the Lords Lieutenant and the newspapers, Liberal and Tory, which had contributed to this result. But he threw no real light on two important problems of Army organisation. The first was the increase which he has brought about in the old Stanhope standard of the strength of our expeditionary force, which, over twenty years ago, was fixed at two army corps. Mr. Haldane replied that he had settled this strength at a point between Tory and Liberal policy. He gave a number of reasons for keeping 11,000 men in the very expensive South African station. The most persuasive of these appears to be that the men will be useful either for trouble in India or, if not in India, in Egypt, and that, in any case, South Africa wanted to retain them, and that it was not convenient for them to go. The truth probably is that they are kept in South Africa because if they were sent home the Army would have to be reduced.

MORE serious still are the Navy Estimates. They show a total of £40,603,700. This the "Daily Mail" proudly describes as a "record," and, in fact, it exhibits an increase of £5,461,000 over last year's Estimates. New construction alone is to cost £13,279,830. Nearly twelve millions of this total will be devoted to "Dreadnoughts" now on the stocks, and to the four "contingent" ships begun this April, and less than a million and a half is for a new and additional programme. This proves to be of the most extensive character. Five more "Dreadnoughts"—four battleships and one nominal cruiser, we imagine—are to be constructed, two by the dockyards and three by private contract. These vessels will be ready at the end of 1912, or the beginning of 1913, so that it is probable that at that time we shall possess 27 or 29 "Dreadnoughts" to Germany's thirteen, in addition to overwhelming power in other ships! In addition to these monsters, we are to build five protected cruisers, twenty destroyers, and a number of submarines, while we are experimenting with an airship. The Estimates, says the Parliamentary Correspondent of the "Chronicle," "sent a shiver through the Lobby." But apparently the Liberal Party will only shiver. A still more characteristic comment was that of a Liberal member, "Awful, but please don't mention my name."

* * *

THE London County Council elections have practically overthrown the only "Moderate" Council which the constituencies ever chose. The "Municipal Reformers," so called because they are neither municipalists nor reformers, went into the fight with a majority of forty (seventy-nine to thirty-nine), and returned from it with one of two (sixty to fifty-eight). This they can increase by taking all the aldermen they can get, but their power is gone. They appear to feel this, for they have invited the Progressives to meet them in conference, and discuss the means of governing the Council on non-party lines. Watch-dogs have had these invitations before, and usually have the sense to decline them. The Progressives must not forget that they have still to win back middle-class London to its old allegiance to their banners. It is disgusted with the wrecking of the "reformers," but it has not recovered its zeal for a forward policy. Only about fifty-three per cent. of the electors voted, and the discredited party retains a majority of votes. But the Progressives have to recapture constituencies of the type of Clapham, Brixton, Norwood, and Chelsea, in order to reinforce the strong industrial vote which they have received from North and East London and the inner Southern divisions where the work-people live.

SIR GEORGE WHITE, the leader of the Nonconformist Party, made a strong protest on Thursday against the Government's continued acquiescence in the state of the Congo. It was clear that the Belgian Government neither meant nor desired reform, and were practically setting Europe at defiance. Sir Edward Grey could promise nothing, except that the annexation of the Congo would not yet be recognised, which is a mere form. He suggested that the hope of awaking Belgian sense of responsibility still existed, but produced no scrap of evidence to show that this was the case. The more "Dreadnoughts" we build, the weaker our foreign policy becomes, so far as any moral purpose is concerned.

ON Wednesday, to the general surprise, Nicholas Tchaykowsky was dismissed by his Russian judges with a verdict of "Not proven." His companion, the aged Madame Breshkowsky, who had avowed her connection with the Socialist Revolutionary Party, and gloried in it, was exiled to Siberia. It is more than two years since Mr. Tchaykowsky, an exile who usually lives near London, was arrested, somewhat disguised and carrying a false passport, as he was leaving St. Petersburg. He was flung into the fortress prison of St. Peter and Paul, and few of his friends, remembering his record as one of the founders of the revolutionary movement of the 'seventies, expected that he would be tried at all. But an influential petition from his American and English friends, backed by several newspapers on both sides of the Atlantic, convinced the autocracy that it had to deal with a man whose character had won for him a high position abroad. He was even released on bail of £5,000. The trial has been conducted in secret, but it was generally known that the chief witness was a spy ex-criminal, a man who had been convicted of murder and brigandage before, and of perjury after he joined the police. Other witnesses were conveniently absent. It should not be assumed that the procedure of Russian political trials has improved because Mr. Tchaykowsky has been acquitted. Few prisoners who come before these courts are well known abroad. No great harm ever comes to the Tolstoyes, or the Gorkys. It is the obscure and friendless who pay.—There is once more talk of a political crisis. All the centre parties in the Duma, including even the Octobrists, have been solemnly telling M. Stolypin that things are at a standstill, and that reform is impossible. A general election is accordingly proposed. What is wanted is rather a "purge" in Court circles.

THE opening of the new Diet in Finland marks a new stage in one of the most serious conflicts which Europe is likely to witness this century. There is, we are afraid, reason to suppose that the solemn Act of Assurance at the Diet of Borgo, sanctioning the separate Finnish Constitution signed by Alexander I. and confirmed by succeeding Czars, may be torn up. It is not promising that so many stories of Finnish plots are being scattered among European newspapers. At the same time a few German and Russian international lawyers, whose names would not, we fear, be immediately recognised in the Universities of Europe, have been persuaded to state that Finland is a mere province or "border territory" of Russia, with no right to rule herself. Arguments supporting this theory are hardly serious, but its appearance at this hour is much more significant. Surely Russia will not take a step that must seriously embroil her with British opinion.

THE Berlin Socialists carried out their "franchise walk" on Sunday with perfect success. The police held Treptow Park in force, mounted and afoot, rural and urban. Some feints were made against it, and one group of demonstrators had a taste of the quality of the police, who fired into it, though its behaviour was perfectly orderly, and wounded as many as twenty-five persons by bullet or sabre. Meanwhile, the real demonstration took place where the police had least expected it, in the Tiergarten, on the very steps of the Siegessäule, and in front of the Reichstag. Speeches were made, the Marseillaise was sung, and the crowd quietly dispersed before reinforcements could arrive. The affair proves three things—(1) that a crowd of tens of thousands of men can keep a secret, for no public announcement of the rendezvous had been given; (2) that the police spies do not know their business; and (3) that these demonstrations, which the Government tries to repress with bullets and sabres and imprisonment, are as orderly, when they are left alone, as any gathering in church. Prussian society shivers a little at the spectacle of the courage, determination, and, above all, the perfect organisation of the masses. The squirearchy drilled them into discipline. But it is the Socialistic leaders whom they obey.

THE Naval Estimates have been this week before the Reichstag. There was an attack in the interest of rival firms on the Krupp monopoly, which dates from the days of Bismarck and the National Liberal ascendancy. The discussion merits our attention only because it drew from Admiral von Tirpitz the statement that naval armor costs per ton £125 in Russia, £115 in France, £97 in England, Italy, and Austria, only £87 in the United States, and some still lower figure (undisclosed) in Germany. Our Admiralty should be closely questioned on that. There was a general discussion on Anglo-German rivalry, in which the Socialist, Herr Südekum, explained the grounds of English uneasiness, pointed out how little Germany has to protect in the shape of Colonies, and warned the German mercantile class that if their armaments forced us into reprisals, the adoption of protection would be a part of them. Herr von Bethmann Hollweg made an anodyne reply about the purpose of German armaments, which, of course, is purely defensive, a reply in the key of his previous invitation to confidential relations between the two countries. There was, however, no hint of any reduction of armaments, nor any invitation to discuss the question.

THERE is evidently something fatal to human virtue in the process of robbing a church. The French are now digesting a scandal almost worthy of Tudor times, and not a little reminiscent of the process by which Thomas Cromwell built up an aristocracy on the ruins of the English monasteries. Among the liquidators appointed after the dispersal of the religious orders, to arrange their property, was a certain Duez, who started life as a clerk in a drapery warehouse, and rose to this position of trust by some protection which has not yet been disclosed. He had thirteen orders to deal with, and he admits annexing some £200,000 in the process. Some of his methods were ingenious. He set to work with the aid of an "heraldic expert" to discover surviving relatives of the original pious donors. To these he assigned the monastic properties, and as they were commonly quite unaware of the fortunate relationship, he had no difficulty in charging a commission of 50 per cent. It is not yet known how he so long contrived to escape exposure. It is well over a year since we read the first hints of this scandal in the Socialist Press. The protection, whatever it was, seems to have been withdrawn somewhere about the time of M. Briand's arrival at the head of affairs. The instinct which makes Panamas will doubtless insist on probing the affair, with the usual consequences to some political reputations.

Two legal appointments of some consequence have been made. Sir John Bigham retires somewhat mysteriously from the Presidency of the Divorce Court and becomes a peer, and his place is taken by Sir Samuel Evans, the Solicitor-General. Sir Samuel made a highly competent Solicitor-General, and he should make an equally good judge. The new Solicitor-General is Mr. Rufus Isaacs, the most accomplished advocate of his time. The new appointments have been filled without loss or check to the Government. Colonel Seely has been re-elected by a majority of 3,333, and, after their defeat in St. George-in-the-East, the Conservatives did not challenge Mr. Isaacs's re-election.

DR. KING, the aged Bishop of Lincoln, died on Tuesday at the age of eighty-one. A friend and pupil of Pusey's, Dr. King was one of Mr. Gladstone's High Church Bishops, and he came near to being one of the martyrs of his party. The judgment in the Lincoln case, with which his name will be associated, went both for and against the ceremonial practices which he favored. But he accepted it, and passed out of the fighting ranks. His real distinction was the unfailing sweetness of his character and demeanor, revealed in a beautiful dying message to his people. Almost alone among the Bishops he represented the tradition of saintliness which the Church of England has never formally dissociated from its higher priesthood.—Judging by Mr. Jowett's brilliant Presidential Address to the Free Church Council, Non-conformity also feels the absence of this ideal from its ministry and the presence of a certain flippancy, sensationalism, and want of depth in tone and doctrine. Later on Dr. Forsyth made a fierce attack on the new theology. But new movements thrive on attack.

Politics and Affairs.

THE THREAT TO EUROPEAN DEMOCRACY.

THE proposal by a Liberal Government of a naval Budget of over 40½ millions, closely following on a military Budget of 27¾ millions, is a matter of which much will and must be heard. The two sums together represent an increase in a single year of close on six millions of war expenditure. Issued in a time of profound peace, they exceed by 3¾ millions the votes passed in the second of the years of feverish shipbuilding produced by the after-thought of the perils of the South African war. No Tory Administration has ever made such demands on the nation's purse. On account of the Navy, the second great Gladstone Government, in the year in which it quitted office, asked directly for not much more than a quarter of the sum which Mr. Asquith and Mr. McKenna now demand of our democracy. For the two services together it only called for about a quarter of a million more than Mr. Haldane's Bill for the Territorial and Regular Army. The vote for naval construction alone exceeds by over two millions the total expenditure on our Army and Navy which led Peel to suggest that the time had come "when the powerful countries of Europe should reduce their armaments." The year 1910 is, therefore, to be marked with black in the annals of Liberalism. Either it, or Europe, or both, have gravely changed for the worse, since the middle-aged men of to-day were young. For the worse, we say, but not for the worst. This sixty-eight million war Budget represents a mere interim stage of expenditure; a moment's halt of the caravan on its journey to the "re-barbarisation" of Europe. This year's forty millions for the Navy is next year's forty-five millions, and that, in its turn, is the easily-crossed stepping-stone to the fifty million naval Budget of 1912.

This is not a situation which the organised British and Irish democracies can accept, knowing, as they do, that when its full consequences appear, the hope of effective social reform is blotted out of the landscape of our politics. If it were the sole condition of our island safety, they would assent. But they feel that, in great part at least, it is a political game, played by the Tories for power, and capped by the Liberals because they are afraid the game may succeed. Their decision cannot be lightly taken, but we must ask the Prime Minister and the Government to consider how gravely they are upon their defence. For these Estimates flow less from the nation's need than from the speech of its servants. The Government sowed dragon's teeth, and the nation reaps taxes. We should have said that the statement of the naval case made last year by Mr. Asquith and Mr. McKenna, fruitful parent, as it was, of all the alarms that have succeeded it, had been almost obliterated by later events. That we may judge how far this is the case it is only necessary to compare those speeches with the admission of the unquestioned facts made by the "Navy League Annual." Mr. Asquith and Mr. McKenna based their demand for the four contingent "Dreadnoughts" on an expectation of 17 German "Dreadnoughts" in the spring of 1912, a figure which Mr. Balfour, not to be outdone in speculative exaggeration, enlarged from 21 to 25. This estimate, in turn, was based on a false view of an "acceleration" of the German Naval Law, a charge which we conceive to be inconsistent with its general scheme and legal character. The 1908 ships, said Mr. McKenna, would all be completed before their time, and the 1909 ships were being hurried forward with corresponding haste. How does this suggestion look to-day? Writing six months later, the Editor of the "Annual" informs us that these 1908 ships were "all late in being laid down"; that the first German quartette of "Dreadnoughts" were equally late, and that, taking the scheme as it stands, the so-called later acceleration represented an effort to wipe out these earlier delays and bring the whole instrument up to time. On this we have the solemn and public assurance of Admiral von Tirpitz and the German Ambassador, not merely that there is no such aim as that of naval equality with England, but that by the autumn of 1912 Germany can only have her regular complement of thirteen "Dreadnoughts" in commission, and therefore that in the spring she will have only eleven. Does Mr. McKenna accept this statement? He has given up his seventeen German "Dreadnoughts" for April, 1912, and with that admission his case falls to the ground. He is now providing twenty-two "Dreadnoughts" (including the "Nelsons") of a superior calibre to the thirteen German "Dreadnoughts" which will be on the seas in the autumn of 1912. If we take the tables of comparative strength given by the "Navy League Annual," which assumes an earlier appearance of the German thirteen, we shall have in April, 1912, 101 modern battleships and armored cruisers of 1,493,800 tons against Germany's forty-eight such ships of 578,120 tons. These ships are backed by a personnel incomparably superior to Germany's, and by an expenditure which doubles hers. This strength we could have attained without alarmist speeches and without contingent "Dreadnoughts," and, above all, without the sensational picture of a stealthy German assault on our naval greatness, the colors of which have already faded away, save on the hoardings where the tatters of the Tory electioneering posters shake against the wind. It constitutes an ample, a magnificent, provision against even seventeen German "Dreadnoughts." But Mr. McKenna's seventeen are gone, and even the "Times," abandoning them, and conjuring up "a similar German acceleration" that "may take place hereafter," or "may, indeed, be already taking place," can only body forth a "contingent" fifteen for 1912, to vanish in turn when they have served their polemical purpose.

If these calculations are sound, we cannot escape the conclusion that the Government have put four unnecessary "Dreadnoughts," eight squandered millions, to the debit of social reform and of the advancement of national efficiency. What of the future? The new programme really means that early in 1913 we may have twenty-seven or twenty-nine "Dreadnoughts" to Germany's thirteen. Within the space of twelve months the Mother Country and her dependent States, pioneers and exemplars in the arts of peace, and subject still to Liberal doctrine and guidance, will be planning or finishing or laying down about fifteen "Dreadnoughts," a fleet equal to that of the whole European and American world put together, with subordinate items too numerous to mention. The five new "Dreadnoughts" to which we are committed are next year's burdens; part of the four "contingents" are largely this year's. By the time they are laid down we shall be planning five or six more, with trimmings in the shape of protected cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and airships. The game is avowedly to give Germany an idea of the hopelessness of a further contest, and to head her off an expansion of her Naval Act after 1911, when her construction of "Dreadnoughts" drops to two a year. Policy is brushed aside from these calculations, for Mr. McKenna informs us that whatever Germany says, she goes on building just the same.

But what if policy has something to say, after all? What if our shipbuilding goes on producing what it always has produced—merely more German shipbuilding? What if the effect among the Germans is to heighten the unthinking fears, as we think, the rational calculations, as they think, that we mean to "bottle up" either their fleet or their diplomacy? Our popular speakers and writers have left nothing undone to convince them that we are an unfriendly Power. They have retorted, and now we have a mechanical statesmanship, here and in Germany, moving doggedly along a blind track, till it stumbles into war. It will be too late to talk of policy then. But it is not too late now. The Liberal Party will have to brace itself for an unflinching inquisition into the following points:—

1. What view of comparative naval strengths, here and in Germany, does the Ministry now hold, in contradistinction to that which it professed in March, 1909?

2. What is its measurement of naval power for this country, and to which of the Prime Minister's two definitions of the two-Power standard do these estimates correspond?

3. What precise and definite effort has it made to secure either an understanding on armaments with Germany, or a revision of the laws of naval warfare?

4. What are its military engagements with France and Russia?

5. What is its general view of foreign policy, and its definition of the purpose and scope of our military and naval armaments?

When these questions are answered, and not before, the Liberal, Labor, and Irish Parties will be in a position to know whether they can support these Estimates. They will also know what shreds from the fabric of Gladstonian doctrine survive, and can conjecture what future remains for European and British democracy under the forbidding and all but fatal commitments with which it is threatened.

THE LORDS ATTACK ON THE COMMONS.

WHILE Liberals are deliberating, the House of Lords and its friends are acting. Indeed the present conflict between Lords and Commons differs from all previous constitutional conflicts in our history, in that it is the established order, the forces of rank, wealth and privilege that have taken the aggressive. The Lords began operations more than three years ago with a deliberate defiance of a newly-elected and overwhelming majority, challenging it on two of the points which had undoubtedly been clearly submitted to the judgment of the people. They developed the attack last year when they claimed the right to "refer" the Budget to the people, and to establish for themselves the right of veto upon finance. They are proceeding now to criticise supply, to overthrow the precedent of 1861, to claim that the financial measures of the year should be submitted to them piecemeal. At the same time, conscious of the weakness inherent in their constitution, they develop schemes of reform. The objective is perfectly clear. There is to be a Second Chamber, not purely hereditary, but undoubtedly Conservative, which is to be in name co-ordinate with the House of Commons, and in fact prepotent. The attack is led from different sides by Lord Lansdowne, Lord Rosebery, and Mr. Balfour, but it converges on one and the same point.

Lord Lansdowne, on his part, presses his attack with his accustomed appearance of sweet reasonableness. He had always been anxious to assist the Government in avoiding the financial difficulties inherent in the rejection of the Budget. To do so would make rejection easy. He is even more anxious to assist them now. To do so covers up his own injury to the commonweal. Here, he says in effect, are some taxes to which objection was taken. But there are many others, and they, for the moment, are the more urgent, as to which we are all agreed. Why not send up these taxes to us? Why involve the nation in bewilderment and certain loss? Why not carry through what we all admit to be necessary, and postpone points of difference to a more convenient season? How foolish of the Government to stand on its dignity, and how unpatriotic to let its dignity get in the way of the public convenience! What Lord Lansdowne does not point out is that his simple plan merely destroys the whole case for the House of Commons. If the House of Commons is to control finance, there can be no separation of the taxes to which the Lords agree from those to which they are opposed. The Lords themselves made the necessity clear in 1860, and Mr. Gladstone, who was a man of resource, showed the House of Commons the way to deal with them. The rejection of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty was within the letter of the privileges claimed by the Lords, but it was a practical extension of their recognised powers, and it was deliberately met by the incorporation of the whole provision for the year in a single measure. No one then dreamt that the House of Lords would upset the whole financial arrangements of the nation by throwing out this comprehensive measure. People in the slow-going days of our fathers considered consequences. They were not content with consigning them to a distant region. But the House of Lords moves as other things, only it moves backwards, and with a recklessness which political writers more often charge on popular assemblies, it destroyed the whole elaborately arranged machinery for meeting the increase of national expenditure last year.

And now its remedy is that if we will be so good as to give up everything that we have ever contended for, to renounce the right of the House of Commons to control taxation, to submit our proposals one by one to its august consideration, it will have the grace to accept such as it likes, while the consideration of those that it does not like will be deferred to a more convenient season. In short, its veto on finance is not only to be general, but particular. Each several item is to pass its scrutiny, from which it follows that by a process of selection and elimination it can dictate the contents of the Budget in every particular. As an argument in support of this aggression, it makes use of the financial chaos which its own action has caused.

But the leaders of the peers have the wit to see that a House constituted so absurdly as theirs cannot permanently sustain such a position. They will therefore, themselves, set on foot schemes of reform, and we may well imagine that those schemes will go beyond the proposals of the Rosebery Committee. Lord Rosebery's resolutions admit the principle that something more than the accident of birth is desirable as a condition of becoming a legislator in a House which is to claim equal, or something more than equal, authority in the work of government. But whatever they propose in detail, we may be sure that they will carefully guard against any fundamental change of character. Mr. Balfour frankly tells us that he does not want a better House. What House could be better for his purposes? What House could be more subservient to his call? What House could more fully perform the function of a Conservative reserve? What House could be so purely partisan, so touchingly loyal to the party cry, so insolent to the people, so deaf to every cry of humanity, so tenacious of the privileges of property as against the rights of life?

Here, then, is the pivot and greatest limiting principle of reform. The new House of Lords must faithfully represent privilege, it must stand for vested interests, it must respect intoxicating liquors, it must embody unimaginative stupidity, it must present a barrier of brass to the plaint of the suffering, it must be ready to hold the glass to the drunkard's lips in the sacred name of the brewer's rights, it must be prepared to swear that food taxes take no morsel of bread from the hungry, it must defend the land from the people. There are many ways of filling such a house with much more plausible deference to modern notions than by merely summoning Lord No Zoo from his pleasures. Lord No Zoo may be left in peace. Perhaps he may be asked to cast his vote once in ten years for Lord Superior or the Duke of Consequences, and delegate his powers to these more up-to-date representatives of the anti-popular will. Perhaps he may find nominated ex-officials of approved Toryism sharing his privileges. But one thing will remain. "All Liberalism abandon, ye who enter here" will for ever be inscribed on the portals of the Second Chamber. And one other thing "reconstitution" may gain at the same time. The power of the Crown has always existed, a visible background to the House of Lords. True, as long as democratic statesmen remain inert, divided, irresolute, that power is little more than a shade. Yet there it is—a permanent, discomfiting possibility. The Lords are under the Crown. The Crown makes them, the Crown can unmake them, or at least change their complexion. Therefore, get rid of the Crown, or, better still, try and lay it across the track of progress. The reformers will doubtless aim at so reconstituting the Second Chamber that the Royal power is formally withdrawn. Revised by a dash of modernity, renovated and started on its new career by Act of Parliament, emancipated from the Crown, secure from the trouble and expense of popular elections, supreme in legislation, equal in finance, the new Second Chamber is to consummate by its very conception the destruction of democracy and the downfall of every hope of social progress.

WHAT IS THE FUNCTION OF THE BRITISH ARMY?

THIS week's debate on the Army Estimates, like so many which have preceded it, was remarkable rather for what it concealed than for what it revealed. It gave occasion to a farcical episode in which the Labor members voted against their own amendment. It drew from Mr. Haldane the usual buoyant speech, in which he explained away the usual stealthy increase in expense, and balanced it with the usual promise of a reduction in the future which never arrives. It provoked the familiar desultory talk about horses and aeroplanes. But on the larger issue of the purpose which this re-organised army is supposed to fill, there was an almost total silence. Mr. Wyndham, indeed, talked invasion, and the assumption that the repelling of this menace is the main reason for the existence of the army was allowed to pass almost unchallenged, save for a grave but brief protest from Sir Charles Dilke. To the mass mind this undoubtedly is the meaning of Mr. Haldane's scheme. It was for this that the "Daily Mail" and the "Englishman's Home" usurped the duties of the recruiting-sergeant. Mr. Haldane summoned the nation to think, and it has consistently thought invasion. Its popular and unofficial guides have doubtless followed what Swift used to call "the sound principles of political pseudology." It is only by focussing the public mind on some unreal danger that it can be induced to regard military questions seriously. The consequences, as Sir Charles Dilke pointed out, may gradually become threatening. There has been no substantial increase in the numerical total of our land forces. Some increase in the efficiency of the Territorials is balanced by a growing decline in the numbers of the regular reserve. It is the cost which continually expands. The pretext of preparing for an invasion which no serious authority believes to be possible, has been used to lure us into this expenditure. The lure becomes too patent, even for Mr. Haldane's power of adroit concealment, when we are faced with such Navy Estimates as those of Wednesday last. This doctrine of a dual line of defence threatens, if it be pushed much further, to add to the burdens of our insular position the not less crushing obligations of a land Power.

The Whigs had reduced the theory of our army to a precise and limited formula. It had to defend India, to hold the garrisons, and to provide for "little wars." The defence of these islands was no part of its duty as they conceived it. For that the navy provided. The last contingency which they would have contemplated was that this army might have been called upon to take its share in a Continental campaign. The utmost liability which had been contemplated up to recent years was defined in 1888, in the Stanhope standard, which both parties accepted up to 1900, as the ability to send abroad two army corps. Mr. Haldane's scheme has substituted for these two corps some six or seven divisions, an increase of nearly 75 per cent. This has happened despite the disappearance of more than one permanent danger, against which our former preparations were mainly directed. The entente with France secured our position in Egypt, which the change of régime in Turkey has further assured. South Africa is a united Commonwealth, bound to provide for her own defence. Russia, if we may judge by events in Persia and the Balkans, is more nearly an ally than a friend. Two diplomatic instruments protect us in India—the Anglo-Russian Convention, which defines the spheres of influence and regulates the ancient rivalries of the two competing Empires, and the Japanese Alliance, which stipulates for the assistance of a Japanese Army in the now impossible event of an invasion of India. Australia and Canada provide by local militias for their own defence, and South Africa will certainly follow their example. What is it, then, that has happened since 1900, which excuses this immense expansion in our conceptions of the expeditionary force? The answer is as freely given outside Parliament as it is carefully ignored within it. The entente cordiale was, in fact, a defensive alliance. There is little reason to doubt the precise statements which have been made on the French side—by the "Temps," by M. Tardieu and M. André Méville, directly inspired as each of them is either by M. Delcassé or by his successor. We hear that we are under a formal obligation to assist the French armies with an expeditionary force, which would land in France in the event of an attack on France by Germany. This open secret is the property of all in the three countries concerned who pretend to be well-informed. It has been set out in black and white by the "Temps"; it has passed uncontradicted in the French Chamber; it has received publicity on German platforms from an authority so competent as Herr Bassermann, the leader of the National Liberals. It is only our own House of Commons which shows no curiosity to have it affirmed or denied. Here is a statement made by competent Continental authorities, which, if it be a fact, colors the whole of our diplomacy, and underlies the whole of our military and naval policy. Parliament, in the occasional annual reviews by which it supposes itself to control our foreign policy, is content to pass it without a question, while it votes the supplies which are unintelligible unless it be such an obligation as this which underlies them. Our army, Mr. Haldane explained, is a mean between what Liberal policy requires, and what the Opposition might require if it should come to power. It is too large for our needs; it is too small for theirs. A party of peace, in other words, is creating a weapon for use in Continental complications, which is a needless burden to-day, and will be an inadequate force to-morrow.

There are other points at which the clear thinking that was to characterise Mr. Haldane's term of office seems to halt. He was at some pains to justify the retention of the 11,000 men who at present garrison South Africa. On the one hand, he declared that we were under a pledge to South Africa to keep them there, but they would be withdrawn when the Commonwealth could undertake its own defence. On the other hand, he urged that this force should be kept at the remoter end of Africa, for use at need in Egypt or in India. The two defences contradict each other, and neither will bear examination. If India and Egypt need this aid, it ought not to be withdrawn after South Africa has reorganised its local defence. One smiles a little at the idea that Generals Botha and De Wet, with the united veteran forces of ex-Burghers and English Colonials behind them, can require this exiguous town-bred garrison for their defence. It is equally difficult to understand what advantage comes to Egypt or India from keeping men in a spot much less accessible than Aldershot at nearly double the cost. The fact is, we suppose, that under the Cardwell system, every superfluous battalion kept abroad furnishes an argument for retaining another superfluous battalion at home. The real reason which stands in the way of a reduction of the army is this unavowed policy which has made us a partner in Continental combinations. We have taken our part as a member of a Continental group in a game to influence the Continental balance of power. Our army, small as it is, plays a certain rôle in that game. If it is important for the French to withdraw the white garrison from Algeria, it is also important for them to secure even so small a reinforcement as we could furnish to their land forces. So long as Parliament is content to leave such vital matters of foreign policy an unexplored mystery, so long will our military schemes fail to answer the Liberal promises of retrenchment.

THE FUTURE OF THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY.

THE party which three years ago took the title of Municipal Reformers, in order to conceal the fact that they were against reform and meant to thwart municipal government, have been deprived of the power to do much further harm to the people of London. Going into the elections with a majority of forty, they come out of them with a majority of two, which they can slightly increase by a strictly partisan use of their advantage with the aldermen. Thus, in the course of twenty-one years' experience of a County Council, London has made one decided venture in anti-municipalism, and has already repented of it. Its five Progressive Councils gave it a labor code and a method of keeping the contractor in order, saved it from the water companies and the old Thames Conservancy, organised one of the best schemes of public carriage in the world, cleansed its river, re-ordered its main drainage, added hundreds of acres to its pleasure grounds and made them the joy of millions of children and young people, modernised its schools, improved and stimulated every department they controlled and initiated many new organs of public care and activity, maintained and encouraged an able and devoted Civil Service, and fired it with their own ideals of the general good. Its one Municipal Reform Council spoiled what they could spoil of this harvest of statesmanship, and depreciated the rest. It would be invidious to compare the "Reformers" of 1907 with the Metropolitan Water Board or even with the Moderates of 1889 and 1902. The latter party contributed little or nothing to the early policy of the Council. But it was not a deliberate anti-London party; it did contain a fair proportion of able men and loyal administrators. Its successor was neither competent nor loyal. Its ideas were as small as its talents, and though it commanded some respectable names, it never once rose to an honest conception of its stewardship. The only London with which it was concerned was the collection of mean streets to which the Borough Councils Act gave a false appearance of unity. Even this carved and shorn London was handled as no Town Council in England would have dared or wished to treat its citizens. If we examine the records of municipal government during the last ten years, we shall see no acts comparable to the scuttling of the Thames steamboats, the starvation of the public schools (and even of the public scholars), and the wrecking of the Works Department. The whole attitude of the "Reformers" to public life was based on a denial of municipal duty, and it is one of the tragedies of our times that not merely the wide heritage of Progressive policy, but the later advances and applications of civic science, should have fallen into hands profoundly false to its principles and grossly incapable of applying them.

Such a party is hors concours; no moderate or even reactionary body in charge of any modern European capital would even shake hands with it. Still less can the Progressives accept the suggestion of the humbled faction now in office, and come to any kind of truce with such an instrument of pure reaction. The deterioration of the old County Council "Moderates" was not an accident; it was a consequence of the movement which revived the school of laissez-faire in the domain where its activity was simply a quarrel with sixty years of progress. Even at the end of the term of Progressive rule, London could not be placed in the first flight of our own municipalities; it was a full generation behind the best German exemplars. Moreover, since the Council took over education the Progressive party was, we think, plainly over-weighted. The eternal feud between Church and Chapel was re-opened, and the Council's older and more familiar administrative responsibilities were weakened. But the mission of the Progressive party is not ended; it is only begun. It would never do to compromise its past and destroy its future by entering into an arrangement with the "Reformers" to run the Council on "non-party" lines. Such an agreement would be an obvious betrayal of the ratepayers, who, if they have not been put upon their guard by the abandonment of the Works Department, would see in this combination of parties directly opposed in principle and in practice the loss of all safeguards against lax or even corrupt dealing with their concerns. It would also destroy the force and obscure the meaning of the Progressive movement. The moral of the Council elections is clear. Those who study the returns will see that they follow along the lines of the General Election. Industrial London is, in the main, ranged on one side, residential London on the other. Both are rather feebly represented, so far as votes are concerned, but they are definitely ranged in opposite camps. Now this force is not enough to guarantee the future of Progressivism. The earlier Progressive Councils were sustained by a more complex constituency. A dozen semi-residential neighborhoods that have now gone Moderate kept the Progressive flag flying right through the period of reaction in Imperial politics, and these must be re-captured. Progressivism was essentially a middle-class movement, and in its young days it attracted the best of Liberal statesmanship and administrative skill, and the flower of the new Radical-Socialist school of thinkers, because it had a clear vision of London rising out of its mid-century squalor and neglect into a great unified organ of civic life. Tory policy largely dissipated this vision, and successive Tory Governments wore down with continued repulses the youthful activities of the party. But the ideal can be renewed, for, though London has stopped, the world has moved on, and when the Progressive party has got its soul again, it will find a new generation of citizens, and a new bundle of wants, waiting on its ministrations.

THE LIBERAL PARTY AND THE WHIPS.

ALTHOUGH the events of the first week of this Session have left an unpleasant memory of anxiety and suspicion which it will take a little time to dispel, let us hope that the Liberal Party in the House of Commons has not come through those few days of despondency without having learned at least one useful lesson.

All politicians have grown accustomed to the frequent employment of military expressions in reference to political life. We talk of "campaigns," "generalship," "tactics," "strategical positions"; we designate the members of the party as "lieutenants" and the "rank and file," and our arguments as "powder and shot," till at last from the constant use of these metaphors the impression gains ground that the composition of a party is identical with that of an army. The general assisted by his headquarters staff spies out the enemy's position and issues orders for the disposition of the troops and the time and place for action, insisting on perfect discipline and expecting implicit obedience. It would not be too much to say that the analogy is not only false, but that the closer a political party approaches the model of an army the more certainly will it be liable to disruption and defeat.

The party is under no special obligation to render implicit obedience to any Government. The only link that can unite the two is unswerving loyalty to certain principles and to a common cause. The Cabinet is not a headquarters staff specially constituted to impose any policy it may evolve within the four walls of its council chamber upon its followers in the House of Commons and through them upon the country. Just in so far as it attempts to do anything of this kind, it is misusing its proper function and inverting the procedure which should give birth to political action. No candidate who attempts to impress his individual views on a constituency can be sure of success, because the constituency in refusing to adopt his views will refuse to accept him as their representative. In the same way no Cabinet can force its party in the House of Commons to adopt whatever policy it chooses, because the very existence of the Government depends, not only on the votes and support, but the cordial acquiescence, of the main body of members. A Cabinet can, of course, initiate and propose, being generally conversant with the broad principles on which the cause of Liberalism is founded, and being able to count on party loyalty while moving on the accepted lines. But, until it has received the party's sanction to its proposals, it cannot with safety attempt to press forward any new projects. After a General Election its particular duty is to formulate and give articulate expression to the wishes of the electors, the precise nature of which can only be learned from the representatives themselves who come fresh from the polls. Such a moment anyhow is not the one to choose to slip into the Government programme novel schemes that have never been submitted to the electorate.

Now, in order that a Cabinet may have no misconceptions and may take no false step, and in order that Ministers, having given a forecast of a certain line of action, may clearly understand in what sense the party as a whole have interpreted the projected action—and it is in these two directions that dilemmas have recently arisen—it is imperative that the electors, the members, the Government, the Cabinet, and the leaders, should be in the closest touch with one another, and that there should be a continued interchange and circulation of ideas and opinions. Nor is anything gained by avoiding conference and consultation with any other party that is prepared to co-operate with the Government. By this means, and by this means alone, can unity, harmony, and effectual action be secured. No one asks a Cabinet to make indiscreet disclosures before its policy is matured, though a moment comes when the party has a right to expect that a firm decision has been arrived at; nor is it asked to disclose any differences that may exist among its members, out of which political capital could be made by the enemy. But disregard for, or indifference to, the opinions of any section of its followers, the existence of aloofness or the setting up of barriers between "lieutenants" and "the rank and file," are elements that are bound to produce an uncomfortable feeling of suspicion and possibly eventual discord.

For the purpose of promoting this desirable and essential interchange and circulation of opinions an instrument exists in the shape of the party Whips. Nothing is more interesting for a private member than hearing what a Whip has to say, but there is something far more important, and that is that the Whip should hear what private members have to say. It may not be interesting, it may not always be pleasing, sometimes, even, it may be unreasonable and annoying, and the more annoying it is, the more necessary is it that he should hear it, digest it, and pass it on. His duty is not only to goad the obstinate and cajole the recalcitrant members, but to collect impressions, gather together the threads of divergent opinions, and be the sympathetic and receptive confidant of as many men as possible. For, however obscure and unimportant some of them may seem to be, they are each one in fact, as elected representatives and as numbers on a division list, on precisely the same level as the Prime Minister himself. Were a completely successful mutual intercourse possible, the existence of factions, sets, camps, and caves would be far rarer. As matters stand, when members are anxious that their particular attitude on an important question should be properly represented to the powers that be, they adopt the only means they have at hand to effect their object, namely, to call meetings, pass resolutions, or send deputations. In acting thus they lay themselves open to unfair accusations of disloyalty, of constituting themselves as leaders, of embarrassing the Government, and of breaking up the party, although they are really intent on rendering a service to their leader.

The tendency to ignore the views of any group of members arose in the last Parliament on account of the huge Ministerial majority. Extremists and wild men could be overlooked; the opinions, in fact, of nearly a third of the party could be disregarded without risk. As it is now, a score of members have it in their power to make the position extremely critical, and this makes free intercommunication between all ranks of vital consequence.

We have a new Chief Whip and several new Junior Whips, all men of ability and deservedly popular. We may be sure that the shocks of the first days of the Session will have shown them the necessity of establishing this mutual confidence, and they will recognise that a Whip's work in this Parliament is very different from what it was in the last. There are rocks ahead, and the course to be steered is by no means easy. So far as strategy is concerned, members are sensible enough to know that the Cabinet must be the best judge of methods and opportunities, and they have not the smallest desire to interfere. But in matters of principle and policy, not only have they a right to be heard, but from now onward it is eminently desirable, from the point of view of security and solidarity, that they should be encouraged to express their feelings and that their opinions should not be stifled, lest smouldering discontent should bring disaster.

A RADICAL MEMBER.

Life and Letters.

VIRGIN SOIL.

A LONG generation has passed since Tourgenieff with his light and pointed harrow skimmed the surface of the "virgin soil" of Russian revolutionary idealism. His novel, by reason of its subtle psychology, its grace, and its pathos, will remain to all time the classical picture of a movement which has failed to make its due impression on the imagination of the modern world only because, by its reckless courage and its almost fantastic devotion, it seemed to pass the limits of the probable. It ranged itself in those days among the weird portents of an alien world of darkness and tyranny and ice. Civilised Europe looked on in the 'seventies and 'eighties, and reckoned these exotic phenomena, with the northern lights and the Siberian winter, a thing outside its hemisphere. It classed the Russian revolutionaries with the strange sects of mystics and heretics who spring from the same virgin soil, with the Doukhobors, who profess the Sermon on the Mount, and the Scoptsi, who mutilate themselves. Tourgenieff took the line of least resistance. He treated the movement "to the people" as a local and half-pathological manifestation. He played to the romantic instincts of his public by concentrating all its heroism and devotion in a young girl, who seems, as we read of her, to be rather Madonna or saint than Russian or revolutionary, while the type of the conscious theorising Socialist is a visionary young man in whom egoism and imagination have combined to paralyse the power of action. On these lines the superb legend became probable. It was very strange, but strange only as all pathology is strange. The world would have understood if these young men had dressed themselves in red shirts and taken rifles in their hands. It was puzzled because they only renounced fortunes and careers, turned their backs on society and the university, flung their property into the common fund, and went among the peasants in the dress and guise of peasants, to teach and organise them. Nothing stranger had happened since the days of the begging friars and the missionaries of Galilee. There was this difference. The begging friars did not regard their pilgrimages as a road to Siberia or the gallows. The people revered them as they filled their bowls, and the official world was proud to win their blessing. The teachers from Galilee did, indeed, leave behind them homes and parents and wives; but they were not called upon to sacrifice learning and fashion, academic honors, or an official career.

It is the rude plough of a Russian State trial which has uncovered the buried strata of this virgin soil this week. The soil is virgin no longer. It has borne its crop of devotion and anger, of self-sacrifice and terrorism, of blood and hope and tears, exile, imprisonment, and torture, mutinies uncounted, abortive revolutions, plots and counterplots, a maimed Constitution and a powerless Parliament. Almost the last of the men and women who were ardent and young in the 'seventies stood white-haired, but still resolute and defiant, to face together the verdict of a secret tribunal. Felix Volkhovsky and Peter Kropotkin are honored exiles in London; Vera Figner, broken and aged after half-a-lifetime of solitary confinement, moves about, a wounded veteran, among younger exiles in Paris, who are giving, as she did, beauty and eloquence and zeal to a cause which never will be lost while it can command such service. But who else is left of that epic time? Nicholas Tchaykowsky and Madame Breschowsky stood in the dock, the last active combatants of the old guard. The mention of Tchaykowsky, honored to-day in America and England, carries one back to the first apostolic grouping which led this movement—the famous "circle" which bore his name. It is easy to understand his ascendancy over his contemporaries. Tall, handsome, commanding—what Russian novelists call a "representative personality"—quick in thought and with a certain volcanic energy of emotion, he had yet learned, in a hard school, reserve and the economy of words. A realist by temperament, his natural bent was towards applied experimental science, intensive agriculture for choice. He combined a certain caution and scepticism over the choice of means, with an unflinching courage and a perseverance which no check could weary. Their novelists have taught us to think of the Slavs as a race easily moved to self-sacrifice, but as easily discouraged. Through the long years of exile, Tchaykowsky never flinched or wasted thought or emotion on the picturesque self-pity in which the weaker refugee is tempted to indulge. If he could do nothing to organise the movement in Russia, he bent his powers to win it friends in England or the States. He had his gallery of memories like every veteran who survives—that comrade of his youth who fell while he escaped, that bright young man who, fired, perhaps, by his own example, met early a fate which the leader challenged but escaped, the sinister face of some spy whom he had trusted, the despairing looks of the mother or the widow who had lost husband or son in the unceasing conflict. There came to him a certain grimness from living in that portrait gallery. The clear blue eyes had hardened from gazing on it, and the end in which so few of the fighting line could share shaped itself in his thoughts as an abstract formula, an inevitable consummation. He cherished his faith at the cold fire of a philosophy of history, and a nice prediction of the march of economic evolution was for him the sign by which he conquered. If faith had failed there was anger to sustain him—the rage of a good man who had seen for forty years the sacrifice of all that was ardent and generous in Russia, the torture of genius and beauty, the slow decay in noisome prisons of strength and courage, that Grand Dukes might peculate, that fanatics might persecute, and officials enjoy their easy round of promotion with sycophancy, of power with self-abasement.

It was a singularly innocent movement when it began, that persecuted Tchaykowsky circle. A few young men and women, students at the University, some of them noble, some of them rich, all of them ardent, devoted, and capable, set themselves to break down the barrier of class which the emancipation of the serfs had left still standing. They founded night schools. They taught the artisans to read and write, and in the common life of what we should call a University settlement, they began to work out a democratic theory. They had the police at their right hand and the literary censor at their left. It was part of their activity to translate into Russian modern progressive books, Darwin and Spencer among the number, and these they lent to their adherents. Early in their history they were compelled to enlist the services of the smuggler of forbidden books and of the secret Press. It was for offences such as these that the young Tchaykowsky served his first terms of imprisonment. The circle was not as yet definitely Socialistic. It had no fixed views of political tactics. Its aims were educative, and if it dreamed at all of revolution, it certainly took no steps to promote it. Prince Kropotkin has left his impressions of this little society as he entered it, when already some of its members had been driven to live "underground" under assumed names and in disguises which for long baffled the police. There grew up among them the passionate comradeship that comes of a common danger, the elevation of thought and the brave idealism of men and women who strengthen each other in the sacrifice of life and ambition and fortune to a disinterested end. They were a knightly order, among whom no trivial or unworthy word was ever spoken. Those who lightly renounced all else, held it the highest honor which life could bring to be received within this circle, and to be trusted by its adepts.

It was the reaction itself which caused the Tchaykowsky circle to evolve towards revolution. The first acts of violence were done to release comrades from an unmerited imprisonment; the first conspiracy was neither an act of revenge nor an attempt to intimidate, but simply a gallant feat which opened a prison door. It was the plain demonstration that the autocracy under Alexander II., who had long since ceased to be the idealist and the liberator, would tolerate no educative work, however harmless, which drove these young men and women into the struggle for elementary freedom. The movement "to the people" sprang partly from a spontaneous impulse which made these missionaries anxious to reach the peasants in their villages, partly from the impossibility of working any longer in open associations in the cities. They went out by ones and twos, men and women alike. Some, like Stepniak, who disguised himself as a carpenter and worked in a travelling "artel" (the traditional Russian guild company, formed on communist principles), were bent mainly on political propaganda. Others, and especially the women, aimed at raising the moral and material level of peasant life. They qualified as elementary teachers, as midwives, or as the empirical half-trained doctors which the Russian law used to recognise. They met with varying fortunes. Some were surrendered to the police by the peasants themselves, others successfully imposed themselves as teachers and leaders, but the spies were on their track and the prisons filled with hundreds at a time. Terrorism had its origin at first as a protest against the betrayal by an occasional traitor, and then as a reply to the repression which had begun to fall indiscriminately on every young man and woman who dared to cherish an ideal of social service. They were tried by the score and the hundred, at first before a jury until juries showed themselves disposed to acquit, and in public until Felix Volkhovsky gave, in the dock, an exhibition of eloquence, half-ironical, half-prophetic, which made his condemnation a moral triumph. The autocracy runs no such risks to-day. The secret tribunal and administrative exile weeded out whatever was generous and courageous in the youth of Russia. Geneva and Paris received those whom Siberia had failed to swallow. A new generation came to manhood before the revolution stirred again.

It was amid the memories of this epic that Nicholas Tchaykowsky faced in secret the selected judges and the witnesses reprieved from the penalties of murder and brigandage that they might perjure themselves in the name of order and the law. He is "the happy warrior" who faced, white-haired, the enemy whom he defied and the perils which he survived in youth. He has come through the peril unscathed. It is the brave old lady at his side who will go to Siberia, not for any deeds or plots, but for professing a creed which our Fabians preach safely from the desks of Government offices. They have made their legend and written their page of history. Russia has not been freed. But the example which they and their comrades set survived the repression of their efforts. It was the memory of what they had faced and endured which steeled the Russian "intellectuals" of our time to face the field courts-martial and to find a bed of honor on the reeking planks of a convict prison. They have dignified life by their readiness to lay it down.

A SAINT AMONG BISHOPS.

ENGLAND has never been, what Ireland once was long ago, a land of saints. Our Church had, no doubt, in olden times its proper quota of registered saints, and a few of them were doubtless men of holy character. But temporal powers, great possessions, and high organisation have always been qualities inimical to saintliness. For whatever be the meaning given to saintliness (and it is surely one of those words of which we only know the meaning when we are not asked), it seems to require a simplicity of character and calling, a gentleness of heart, an indiscriminateness of charity, that are not easily compatible with an ecclesiastical institution. For whatever virtues of wisdom, of goodness, even of holiness, may emanate from the corporate life of a Church, there is an individuality in saintliness which for its very gentleness is apt to be overborne or quenched by the larger, more impersonal power. The very doctrine of subordination is, perhaps, fatal to this noblest flowering of personality, for the humility which bows most completely before ecclesiastical authority is the excessive denial of a "self" whose sweet assertion is most needed for the saintly life.

Absolute submission may be the condition most favorable to that more impersonal "holiness" which the Church has ever recognised as the goal of the religious life, but "holiness" and "saintliness" are not the same thing. For though the saint may not stand alone, for his inner virtue or his exterior status, though he requires the fellowship of a Church, he is never Church-made, but draws his virtue from a primal purity of soul. Indeed, the conditions of his adhesion to, and still more his direct and full participation in, the collective or common Christian life, have always been a perplexing problem for the saint. From the anchorite isolation to the complete temporal and spiritual communion of the most highly centralised monastic order, the soul that sought to keep itself unspotted from the world would ever fluctuate, seeking peace.

In these later days, when people speak of saints or prophets, our thoughts do not straightway turn to our Churches. Nor, indeed, do we think of England's greatness as in any way associated with this type of human achievement. To India, Persia, and in general the non-practical East, we look for such high cultivation of the soul, and for the popular spiritual acceptance and response which sainthood requires. And yet we are mistaken in thus disparaging our time and country. In this age of materialism and intellectualism, both qualities deemed adverse to simplicity and purity of feeling, there are around us shining in quiet corners of our busy world examples of true saintliness whose lustre is even enhanced by their drab surroundings, men and women who carry help and healing in their very countenance and bearing, and whose converse is a glow of true divinity. Such power and purity of soul triumph over every "environment," nay, indeed, transmute it into an instrument of noblest service by the very alchemy of their presence. Indeed, to those who tell us that the Church is a moribund institution whose corruption and decay poison the fountains of spiritual personality instead of feeding them, it is always possible to reply by pointing to a Keble, a Manning, or, in the more detailed labors of human service, a Sister Dora and a Father Dolling, whose star-like souls do not dwell apart, but are ever in contact with the larger constellation of celestial powers.

As Epictetus found it possible, even in slavery, to practise virtue, so we may find a man of saintliness upon the episcopal bench. We speak in no tone of sarcasm, but of sober truth. For all who know the structure and the external operations of the Established Church are well aware that the processes of official advancement and elevation are not such as will lead us to expect to find upon the episcopal bench many men resembling in spiritual quality the Bishop whose passing away good men and women are this week lamenting. There is nothing in the extensive record of his labor to distinguish him from many others who have gained preferment in the Church. A Canon of Christ Church, a President of a Theological College recognised as the nursery of ritualism, a Professor of Pastoral Theology at Oxford,

Bishop of Lincoln for a quarter of a century, this record of functions tell us very little of the man whose nature and influence are described by one who knew him as "one whose very name carries light and lustre with it; who brings honor and beauty to the office which he bears; one whose name is an inspiration, whose presence is a benediction, whose face is a message of joy and consolation wherever he passes. . . . It is impossible for us not to believe that, however dark the outlook and the position, God is yet working out some great good for the Church when the instrument that is used is Bishop King of Lincoln."

We cannot ourselves affect any sympathy with many of the Bishop's cherished opinions, ecclesiastical or lay; in religion, as in politics, he looked backward rather than forward for his authority, and it was a pathetic vision a few weeks ago to watch this feeble, good old man, like some stray sheep among the goats, tottering into the House of Lords to record his vote against the Budget. But all mere opinions, however firm, fall away, fade into triviality, before the quality of soul that speaks from such a message of farewell as this dying prelate—save the mark!—issued but a few days since to his "dear people" from his sick bed. "All I have to do is to ask you to forgive the many faults and innumerable shortcomings during the twenty-five years I have been with you, and to ask you to pray God to perfect my repentance and strengthen my faith to the end. All has been done in perfect love and wisdom." And he adds these supremely significant words: "My great wish has been to lead you to be Christ-like Christians." The phrase, we are aware, is "common form" in many of our Churches. But in this last word we can attribute to it no common meaning. For it must always present the gravest perplexity and the deepest trouble to the saintly nature to contemplate the sort of Christianity that passes muster, not merely among "professing Christians" in this country, but among genuinely devout persons, such as are most of the fellow-occupants of the Bishop of Lincoln upon the episcopal bench. For there has always prevailed in this country a fairly definite British Christianity which is not even in direct profession Christ-like, but which is the real religion of almost all the genuinely religious people of this country, including the Bishops. We say it is not Christ-like, because it excludes, or, even worse, it explains away, some of those principles of the conduct of life which, to the founder of Christianity, were fundamental. Tolstoy preaches these principles, but he is a heretic, and neither our Church nor his own will receive him. To us he is simply a "literary man," we have no room for him as what the Roman Church calls a "practising" Christian. To love our enemies, to resist not evil, and to despise riches, are three behests which never, even "in theory," has our Church attempted seriously to inculcate as principles of conduct. We live in an age when the Church is a mighty organisation, taking the world—and the flesh—into close partnership for the execution of the many works to which it sets itself. It has through the ages been able to persuade itself that it could sanctify the use of great material power, and that it would not itself succumb to that use. Of all the wiles of the Evil One seeking to bring to naught the powers of organised religion, this is probably the most fatal. It is, indeed, the supreme instance of "the deceitfulness of riches." It might almost be contended that the distinctive mark of the saint was that he saw through and resisted this temptation. There are amongst us multitudes of religious people who read lives of saints, who believe that they get good and guidance from these examples. But what sort of sympathy do they feel for the practical saintliness of St. Francis? "And this is what I call a great treasure, that there is nothing here provided by human industry, but everything is provided by Divine Providence, as we may see manifestly in this bread which we have begged, in this stone which serves so beautifully for our table, and in this so clear fountain; and therefore I desire we should pray to God that He would cause holy poverty, which is a thing so noble that God himself was made subject to it, to be loved by us with our whole heart." A hard saying, is it not, for British Christians?

THE ART OF VANISHING.

THE question is, which may be the cleanliest manner of escaping, not from existence (for that is a matter of a bare bodkin and a pail of water), but from identity, which is a complicated concern. It is evident that the desire for escape is almost universal among mankind. Consider the delight in masks and dressing-up, the fetish dances, the fancy-dress balls—all equally pleasurable to savages and Society. Consider the joy of all men and women in giving themselves another face to the one God gave them—the joy in painting and false hair, in shaving, in tableaux, charades, and theatricals. Solemn moralists may call us self-centred, self-satisfied, self-conceited, but they do not go to Covent Garden; they have never seen a puny shred of human flesh so little self-satisfied that it posed as Achilles, or disguised the lamentable reality under the similitude of Neptune with his trident. A dog does not ape the lion unless man clips him; a cat never questions her own sufficiency; a rat dips his tail in oils only to lick it. Man alone of animals is plagued with humility; he alone distrusts his value, and longs to escape the trammels of himself.

The greatest and wisest furnish us with examples. From the prime of the world, princes have been transformed into toads and beasts so readily that their people hardly noticed the difference. We read that Augustus, once a year escaping from divinity and the kingship of the world, played the mendicant in rags upon the curbstones of the city. This week Paris has affected to ignore a Duke of Lancaster's more familiar designation. Last summer a member of Parliament announced his intention of visiting Switzerland incognito—a ruse that surpassed the demands of absolute necessity. Why could not the excellent Dr. Jekyll be satisfied with one personality? Why did the Lord of Burleigh ever suppose that anyone but the Royal Academy and a village maiden would take him for a landscape painter? These are cases in which so praiseworthy a virtue as humility has tended almost to abasement in its dissatisfaction with self. Similarly among writers, Swift wrote best as a draper or sea captain, Carlyle as a German philosopher, George Sand as a man.

"Patriæ quis exsul," asked the Roman—"What tourist has escaped himself?" But when we meet tourists abroad, we cannot doubt that their object is to escape, and that they have succeeded in escaping the constrained personality of their suburbs, though the thing they reveal in clothes and behavior may only be a truer self. Every bank-holiday reveller rejoices in displaying a nature finer than his habitual—more generous, reckless, and gay. In every life there come moments when, as the old comic opera song said, it is time for disappearing. The song advised you on such occasions to take a header and go down until it seemed a suitable opportunity to emerge serenely. Our instances, so far, have shown that this brief obliteration may be accomplished with success. But what shall we say for those who plunge without desire to emerge—the princes who would choose to swelter venom in cold stones for ever, the kings and members of Parliament who would die incognito, the lords who would become real artists, the tourist exiles who would never return by Tube?

There have been many such, and in various ways they have striven to confound their identity. Few, indeed, have proved so successful as the Man in the Iron Mask, who attained to the distinction of being no one. But Charles V. submerged his glory in a monastery, and daily rehearsed his own obsequies till death rang the curtain up for the complete performance. To eat grass as the ox, to grow feathers as the bird, and be wet with the dew of Heaven might seem an unnatural ferity, had not the King of Babylon commended it by his example, and many thousands of holy men adopted that mode of life among Egyptian deserts and the pinnacles of meteoric cliffs. What shore is not strewn with the derelicts of Europe? What Pacific isle is not haunted with beachcombing shadows of a past? How many have risen on stepping-stones of their dead selves to different things! It is oblivion that must first be sought, and some have found it, like Waring, in an Adriatic boat; some, like Valjean, in a plunge from the galleys; some, like Monte Christo, in a shotted sack; some, like John Harmon, in a Thames mortuary; some, like the Silver King, in a railway accident, backed by the "Daily Telegraph"; some in the House of Lords.

Short of suicide, all these escapes from self are open. There is another, which we cannot recommend, though this train of thought was started by the excellent account given of it in Herr Erwin Rosen's volume, just issued by Messrs. Duckworth. We mean "The Foreign Legion," forming part of the French army, and having its headquarters in Algeria, though always ready for service at a moment's notice in any part of the world. The existence of such a regiment is one of the most interesting problems of humanity, and if only our University Professors of Psychology would join it for five years, we are convinced they would be able to throw much new light upon the human mind. In some instances, men are driven to it by general misbehavior or trouble about a woman, and that, we gather, was Herr Rosen's case. To him the Legion was the readiest alternative to romantic suicide; he wisely took it, and, having successfully deserted, is now happy ever after, as we are glad to be informed. For some it is the alternative to gaol, and to them it has the advantages of a prison enlivened by sun and air and an occasional debauch. The great majority are recruited by hunger; to many Frenchmen, as well as to thousands of Alsatians, Germans, and Italians, the Foreign Legion takes the place of the English workhouse, and, savage as the life is, any man worthy of manhood would prefer it. But our interest for the moment is not with the hungry; it is with the recruits who join simply to escape from themselves—to cut their line of life in half, to start fresh in their short race to the grave, and, if only it is possible, to become a new being when their bodies are already one-third the age of man. Herr Rosen's obviously truthful account of the Legion and its life proves how desperate a plunge they take into the waters of forgetfulness.

The Legionary's existence is almost uninterrupted toil on a halfpenny a day, plus uniform, barrack sheds, and a minimum of food. Cleaning, drill, firing, road-making, and marching—that is his life. Above all, marching. On the route marches, simply for training and discipline, the Legion covers a minimum of 25 miles a day, carrying kit and rifle that come to 100 lbs. weight together, and that along sandy tracks under the African sun. The sick are arrested; stragglers are dragged over the ground behind carts; a legionary who slinks into the desert is sure to be butchered by Arab women with horrible mutilations. In barracks the one joy comes on the fifth day, when the wages of twopence-halfpenny secures a pint of wine and three ha'porth of tobacco. For the smallest offence, especially for losing a fragment of uniform, the punishments are intolerably severe, though the silo, or exposed pit, and the crapaudine, under which a man became a semi-circular bundle with legs and arms lashed together over his back, have lately been abolished. So life goes on from day to day, the original contract lasting five years; but at the end of that time the contract may be renewed for another five, the pay being a little increased with length of service, until fifteen years have passed. The legionary may then retire on a pension of £20 a year, if Providence has granted him so long a life, which is, indeed, seldom. In nearly all cases, the last oblivion has overwhelmed his body in unrecorded sand before half the term has run.

Perpetually harassed and overstrained, exposed to unanswerable insults, tormented by heat and thirst, brutalised by inevitable vices, the legionaries fall into a hysterical excitement or a brooding madness, both of which they call "cafard." They hack off their fingers to avoid service, they drink absinthe in milk to induce fever, they feign insanity for months together, all at the risk of being sent as "Zephyrs" to the deadly treatment of the penal battalion. The staple of their conversation is the best way to desert, though desertion seldom succeeds, and failure means a hideous death in the desert or heavy penalties on recapture. Yet the Legion is always full; it now averages over 10,000 men;

the author estimates that more than 100,000 have entered its ranks since its establishment eighty years ago. And, what is more remarkable, the legionaries take an intense pride in the Legion's reputation for cleanliness, marching, music, and behavior on the field. When the order for active service comes, the whole Legion is full of joy. Eleven times it has refused to obey the order for retreat in battle.

The Professors of Psychology who will join it can explain to us the reasons of many contradictions equally strange. We refer to the Legion now only as an example of the means to which men turn for escaping from themselves. The women who in old days recruited in our army, or served our battleships and travelled with Captain Cook, devised a wash-out of the past still more complete. Deep down in the soul lurks this desire for the destruction of half itself, a demi-suicide, an obliterating initiation, a renewed infancy, a rebirth in maturity, a cancelling of debts, a moral "nova tabula," a clean slate, if not a clean heart. For this object the Greeks celebrated their mysteries, scoured the neophant with bran, and bade him rise from the holy bath exclaiming, "Evil have I fled, to the better have I sped." When we describe anyone as a new man, we always mean that he has altered for the better and not for the worse. In everybody's breast the hope is laid up that at any moment by a change of circumstances he may become a new man, having cut himself loose from the haunting associations that keep calling him back to the past and dog his footsteps with hateful reminders, like the barking Furies or the sleuth-hounds of the Charity Organisation Society. To leave all hampering impediments behind, to set out lightly burdened as a baby upon the remaining pilgrimage of grace, to start fresh, to flee away into the wilderness and be at rest, that is the hope even of the Foreign Legion's recruit—an elevating and consolatory hope, no matter how frequently the theoretic philanthropist may tell us it is disappointed.

ON PROVERBS.

To the Icelanders who boasted that Iceland was the finest land the sun shone upon, Thangbrand, the drunken priest in Longfellow's "Saga of King Olaf," tauntingly replied that "three women and a goose made a market in their town." This proverb is found all over Europe, from Iceland to Sicily. "Tre donne e un papero fanno un mercato," it runs in Italian. The question suggests itself, about it as about all proverbs, "Did it travel from South to North, from East to West, or was it the spontaneous popular expression of a fact observed everywhere?" There seems no doubt that the latter is the case. In the proverbs of all lands, the thought is the same, as the experiences of humanity are the same always, but the expression varies according to local conditions and circumstances. "To carry owls to Athens," "to carry fir-trees to Norway," "to carry coals to Newcastle," "to sell shells to those who come from St. Michel," are local variations of a universal idea. "To carry water to the sea" is French, German, Dutch, Portuguese. "He no more wants it than the sea wants water" is the usual English version of this proverb, and one remembers in very early days (when it was a question of another tart or apple) resenting the application of this particular piece of proverbial wisdom. "To throw a sprat to catch a mackerel," again, we have all been familiar with from our cradles. In versions of this proverb current all over Europe, it is only the kinds of fish that vary. The Dutch say "to throw a smelt to catch a cod," the French "one must lose a minnow to catch a salmon." "Donner un œuf pour avoir un bœuf" is another variation of the same theme. This idea of the proper course to be taken by enlightened self-interest is very widespread. "There is a withholding that tendeth to poverty," the great Master of proverbial wisdom declared, and a French proverb advises us "to give a piece of cake to him who has a pie in the oven." Retaining rather than getting is the idea in the Italian "to him who gives you a pig you may well give a rasher," or the Spanish "to him who gives you a capon you may spare a wing and a leg." To give one or two more examples of these foreign equivalents of our most familiar phrases: the Italian variation of "to kill two birds with one stone" is "to catch two pigeons with one bean," the Dutch is "to bring down two apples with one stick." "To make an elephant out of a fly" is Russian, Italian, and Dutch. This is much more picturesque than our "to make a mountain out of a mole-hill." No doubt in all three countries, widely separated as they are, the same image presented itself to the popular fancy playing with the same thought. Better still is the Portuguese rendering of the idea "to make a knight in armor out of a flea." These variations, sometimes very slight, show the independent origin of the proverbs. We say, "When the cat's away the mice will play." The French say "Absent le chat les souris dansent," and they dance in like circumstances in every other European country. People of most other nations buy a cat in a poke—"acheter chat en poche"—instead of a pig as we do.

Nothing in the world gives the present writer greater pleasure than to come upon some quite new proverb in a foreign book, or some different version of an old, well-known one, or to find the universal character of proverbs illustrated by hearing suddenly from English lips a proverb he had always supposed to be French or Italian. "God sends t' meat, and t' divil cooks it," said the good woman of a small farm-house in a remote district of the North Riding of Yorkshire, who had been complimented on her cooking. "Dio ci manda la carne, ma il diavolo i cuochi," is Italian, but the writer has never come across it in any other language, and has only heard it that once in English. Again, he remembers hearing "to skin a flint and spoil a shilling knife in doing it." This is a variation of the French "gâter une chandelle pour trouver une épingle." "The young cock crows as it hears the old one," used to be common when he was a boy, but he has never heard it since. Richard Whiting, the last Abbot of Glastonbury, speaks, by the way, of "our most ancient English proverb, 'the young cock croweth as the old doth learn and teach.'" There are many equivalents of this used all over Europe. He remembers on one single occasion hearing "To give a Roland for an Oliver." The French of this is "rendre pois pour fève"—"to give a pea for a bean"—and the Italian "dare pan per focaccia"—"to give bread for gingerbread." "An ounce of mother-wit is worth a pound of clergy," used to be common enough a generation ago, and the word "clergy" used in the sense of "learning" shows how old the saying is. There is something like it in almost every European tongue. "Dio ci manda il freddo secondo i panni," "God sends the cold according to the clothes," is the Tuscan for "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." The same sense is given by perhaps the most beautiful of all proverbs, found in old French and Italian, "God builds the nest for the blind bird." Some proverbs, otherwise universal, seem not to exist in English. For instance, the writer has never heard or read anything in English like "Au pays des aveugles le borgne est roi." "To be king among beggars" is, or was, a very common English phrase.

Proverbs give many delightful glimpses into the life of vanished days. The manners and the dresses of the Middle Ages could be reconstructed from them. Thus the German "'What we must suffer for the sake of God's Church,' as the Abbot said when he burnt his fingers with the roast chicken," carries us back to a time before forks. "To laugh in one's sleeve," is as good as a picture of the dress of Plantagenet days. "Mettre la charrue devant les bœufs,"—a variant of our "to put the cart before the horse,"—calls up at once the old-world Virgilian way of ploughing. We hardly realise, perhaps, how concrete, how full of images, our traditional popular language is. A trouble, for instance, is a "burden," and in Christian countries a "burden" is interchangeable with a "Cross"—the great Burden. A proverb, above all, is the translation of a thought or an idea into an image. Every true proverb is a quaint and delightful little picture in half-a-dozen words.

An artist with a whimsical fancy who would set about illustrating a book of proverbs would find no end of beautiful and fantastic things. "Femme qui beaucoup se mire peu file," for instance, calls up a girl of seventeen with a great mass of red gold hair in a cobwebbed garret—Margaret sitting glorious there—forgetful of her stepmother's scowling brow and lifted stick, dreaming by silent wheel and idle distaff and neglected flax, before a great round mirror in a copper frame, which shows the reflection of a lovely face. There are great possibilities in "a cat may look at a king." The writer prefers the French, "un chien regarde bien un évêque." One sees the little spaniel in his basket looking with affectionate confidence at an old bent bishop in a purple cassock, in his great carved chair, in the low oak-panelled, tapestried room, lit by wax tapers in silver sconces, with the firelight flickering on pectoral cross and amethyst ring. Some truly delightful proverbs suggest not only pictures, but fairy tales like Andersen's, or grotesque contes like Hoffmann's. Such are "chi ha capo di cera von vada al sole"—"he who has a wax head should not go in the sun," or better still, "chi ha coda di paglia ha sempre paura che lo pigli fuoco"—"he who has a straw tail is always afraid of its catching fire." The French say, "if your head is of wax, don't become a baker." What would not one give to read "The Man with the Wax Head," or "The Man with the Straw Tail"?

The delightful suggestions of proverbs are, indeed, endless. One meets in them all the old-world figures, the priest, the innkeeper, the miller, the blacksmith—one hears the cheery bustle of market day, the sound of flute and fiddle at village fêtes in old-time France. There is the stay-at-home wonderment at far-off places and things, the road leading to Rome with its Pope and Cardinals, the southward flight of stork and swallow, and their return in the spring, the stories of "warm countries," told as in Andersen's tales by nurses to children in the far North. One sits by the fireside in a house of a little Danish town among the blue-eyed, flaxen-haired children, or in some country inn in seventeenth century Holland, when the shuddering tales of the Spanish cruelties had half become matter for a jest.

Will there ever be any more proverbs made? We seem to have lost the power of thinking in images, in this delightfully concrete way. One cannot but feel that the atmosphere of a democracy is unfavorable to proverb-making. The old-time people accepted life as they found it—their business was to live, not to make laws or to reform the world, and so their interest was not in politics, but in life itself. The King and the Court, the laws and the war, were as unalterable as summer and winter. The people did not meddle with them, and so had the more leisure for stories and ballad-making and the spectacle of the world. The proverbs, for all their frequent bitterness, are full of the joie de vivre.

The writer has once, at least, found himself in such an atmosphere as that in which these old sayings were made. He was detained with a sick friend in a village in Lower Brittany, and wandering out aimlessly one morning, found an unusual stir and animation in the street. It was caused by a blind man playing a flute, accompanied by a dog holding in his mouth a tin can in which to gather sous. Like the Pied Piper, the blind man had attracted all the children in the village (school, if compulsory, did not appear to be very stringent), and not the children only. Everybody in the place had leisure to wonder at the blind man, and especially at the dog, and everybody was able to find a sou for his can. Out they came from the dark little shops—Yves Bannalec and Yves Le Borgne. There were faces at every window and at every door, the crippled tailor, the hunchbacked old woman, figures often grotesque enough, but full of interest, vivacity, good humor. It was in such a world of contented leisure and cheery acceptance that the old proverbs were made.

The Drama.

A SECTION AND A SLICE.

For two reasons, I wish it were not incumbent on me to write quite sincerely about "The Madras House." The first is that when a play has given you such keen and abundant pleasure as this play gave me, it seems ill-conditioned to make any reservations; the second is that, artistic human nature being what it is, I feel sure that my reservations will do Mr. Barker no good, but may, if they have any effect at all, tend to harden him in his—what shall I say?—in his foibles, or his excesses. It is by carefully disregarding my counsels of prudence and commonplaceness that Mr. Barker has become the brilliant and original playwright he is. But it remains true that "The Marrying of Anne Leete" is not a successful play, even by the most rarefied standard of success; and it may one day be accepted as equally true that "The Madras House" would be a better play if it did not taper off into nothingness—if the talk did not outrun the interest by about five minutes in Act III., and by about twenty minutes in Act IV.

So much premised, let me hasten to say that, in the main, this new technique, which Mr. Barker has invented, seems to me a most valuable addition to our dramatic resources. What is its character, its definition? Manifestly the old formula of the "slice of life" will not do. The slice of life implies, in its very terms, something chopped off from life, an incident or an action that can be cut away from the mass and form a whole in itself. Mr. Galsworthy's "Justice" may be called a slice of life, though it is very different from the mere crudities that used to go by that name in the distant 'nineties. It is an individual whole, an incident studied from its beginning to its end, and with all irrelevances eliminated, except—if the bull may be pardoned—those which are indispensably relevant. But "The Madras House" is not an incident at all. It shows us several incidents in process, but not one of them can be said either to begin or to end. It is not a definite whole detached from life, like a microscopic preparation, but rather the application of a powerful magnifying glass to certain portions of the living social organism. Shall we say that it is not a slice, but a section, like that which we see when a railway cutting lays bare three or four different strata of rock, mutually exclusive one of the other, and yet interdependent inasmuch as circumstances have jammed them together in close local contiguity? Not that "The Madras House" lacks unity. It has not, like "Justice," the unity of a close-linked chain, but rather that of a stone cut in many facets. In other words, it has unity of theme; and its theme is the position and destiny of women in this queerly-ordered world.

What a gallery of women it presents! First, the terrible and terribly true group of the Denmark Hill mother with her five unmarried daughters, all drifting into middle-age with the seal of suburban spinsterhood on their narrow foreheads. This Huxtable interior is a marvel of observation and life-like movement; an admirable contrast, moreover, to the æsthetic-intellectual, one-child, Phillimore-Gardens interior of the fourth act. Then we have the soured, silly, exacting, ineffectual Mrs. Madras, a martyr to pains of body and emptiness of mind. In the second act, again, we have three absolutely masterly pieces of portraiture: the hysterical, un-governed shrew; the rigid, ironclad old maid; and the clever, competent, unillusioned woman who, being economically self-supporting, and having no social position to lose, can look forward with equanimity and almost with exultation to the "trouble" which her thirst for life has brought upon her. The scene between these three and their unconventional employer is a piece of admirable and most original comedy. Finally, we have in Mrs. Philip Madras, the restless, semi-satisfied woman of culture, who tries to find in æsthetics a refuge from her senses on the one hand, her social conscience on the other, and who, without passion, drifts within measurable distance of vulgarities which are foreign to her better nature. All these types are admirably observed and vividly portrayed; and the whole of the third act, in which no woman appears, save three mute "mannequins," is devoted to a discussion of female character and function, which I venture to call one of the most scintillating passages in modern literature. The American philosopher-financier, Mr. Eustace Perrin State, is a gem of humor, and at the same time an extraordinarily faithful study. I do not mean that any American is quite like him, but that his character is compounded of genuinely American traits. As for Constantine Madras, the mouthpiece of Oriental anti-feminism, he is less happily conceived inasmuch as he betrays a touch of the Shaw influence. But this does not seriously detract from the originality and delightfulness of the scene. It is full, as indeed the whole play is, of brilliant wit, which is never mere epigram, but always a true product of character and situation; and among all the brilliancy, there is every here and there a saying of real profundity, a memorable flash of insight or poignant utterance of truth.

It may seem that my threatened reservations are long of coming, and even that, after what I have said, there is scant room for any reservation at all. The fact is, they do not arise until the very end of the third act, and it is to the fourth alone that they apply with any force. It is the old story—Mr. Barker is so determined not to be theatrical, that he sometimes forgets to be dramatic. He drifts away into sheer talk, which is no part of any action or fragment of an action, but exists simply (or so it would seem) because he has some ideas left over, which he feels he must at all hazards express. No doubt he will think this a quite unjust way of putting it; he will prefer to say that his characters remain incomplete until they have talked themselves out. Well then, let us accept this version of the case: the fact remains that it is a technical error to leave portions of character undeveloped until every semblance of action is over and done with. If, and inasmuch as, the technique of the first three acts is right, that of the fourth act is wrong. The first three acts, despite their lack of continuous story, are absorbingly interesting; but for one reason or another the interest of the fourth act is languid from the first, and dies away altogether long before the end. The talk between Philip and Jessica Madras is good enough talk in itself, but we feel it to be all wrong at that point in the play. Mr. Barker may reject the reasons I have tried to give; but I can assure him of the fact that I strove in vain against the feeling of restlessness which I felt to be taking hold of my neighbors and of the house. I tried to persuade myself that I did not feel it; I told myself that a first-night audience is abnormally nervous, and recalled how the third act of "Waste" had on first hearing seemed to me much too long, while on second hearing I would not have spared two words of it. But the very fact that these thoughts had time to pass through my mind showed that I was not absorbed in the drama; and at last I had reluctantly to yield to the feeling that I did not want to sit and listen to the fire-side talk of Philip and Jessica, when I knew that there was no point to be settled, no climax to be reached, in short, nothing to come of it. Mr. Barker ignores what I take to be a fundamental fact in the psychology of the theatrical audience: that it is anticipation which keeps us in our seats at the play, and that, when all anticipation is over, the curtain cannot fall too promptly. In other words, it is an author's business not to let his action, however slight it may be, run out before his character-study is completed—more especially when the dregs of his character-study have a suspicious air of mere abstract philosophising.

The acting of "The Madras House" is altogether admirable. Quite in the first line I would place Mr. Arthur Whitby, whose performance of the American financier was a pure delight. Mr. Charles Bryant and Mr. Charles Maude gave us the best pieces of comedy they have ever done; the soft-voiced subtlety of Miss Fay Davis's Jessica Madras was memorably excellent; and Mr. Eadie, Mr. Garden, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Casson, Miss Florence Hayden, Miss Mary Whitty, Miss Mary Jerrold and Miss Mary Barton were all as good as they could possibly be. This is the advantage of a play which puts actors on their mettle.

A typical and most interesting "slice of life" is Lady Bell's play, "The Way the Money Goes," at the New Royalty Theatre. It seizes, develops, and exhausts an incident. It is a rare instance of real dramatic skill coming to the aid of intimate knowledge of social conditions. There is unmistakable and terrible truth in the way in which the excellent Mrs. Holroyd, quite against her will, blunders into one after another of the pitfalls that are dug for the feet of the ignorant and inexperienced poor. In the ordering of the incidents, too, there is ingenuity of the best sort—ingenuity as distinguished from artifice. The play interests us, moves us, widens our knowledge and our sympathy. My one quarrel with it is that it ends too tamely. I long to see John Holroyd, that insufferable pharisee in fustian, made to realise that it is he and not his wife that is to blame. If Lady Bell could not find it in her heart to let Mrs. Holroyd "round upon him," she might at least have let Mrs. Riggs do so, even if it had involved some modification of that good lady's character. Miss Helen Haye's performance of Mrs. Holroyd is a very remarkable piece of acting, and the whole cast is more than competent.

HOPE FOR PROVINCIAL OPERA.

It was a rather curious coincidence that just at the time when Mr. Beecham was waking London up with his "Elektra" and other performances, and with his promise of a further spring and autumn season at His Majesty's and Covent Garden, Edinburgh should have been the scene of an operatic experiment that may have consequences as far-reaching for the provinces as Mr. Beecham's schemes may have for London. No dweller in the provinces needs to be told of the unsatisfactory state of opera there. We have some touring companies that do their work honestly according to their lights and their means, though the lights are sometimes dim and the means often inadequate. The repertoire mostly consists of operas that kindle little or no enthusiasm in musicians who have moved with the times in orchestral or chamber music. People who have become interested in the later Wagner, in Strauss, in Debussy, in Elgar, and in Bantock, feel no particular yearning to spend an evening over Gounod's "Faust," or "Tannhäuser," or "Lohengrin." So desolate is the state of opera that the managers of our touring companies think they have done something wonderful when they have spent a week in an ordinary town without giving "Maritana" or the "Bohemian Girl." Now and then attempts are or have been made at such things as "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried," or "The Valkyrie," but the means at the disposal of the companies have been quite inadequate for performances that would satisfy musicians who had heard the works elsewhere. Your intentions may be the best in the world, but good intentions will not enable you to play the score of "Tristan" with an orchestra of forty or so; nor are the people who have spent their lives with "Faust" and "Maritana" and the "Bohemian Girl" the ones to make "Siegfried" sound and look as its creator intended it to do. The situation therefore seemed absolutely hopeless. So long as opera in the provinces means a round of stale works pretty well given, with an occasional dash of great modern works badly given, musicians will have nothing to do with it; while the reply of the companies is that until the musical public supports them better they cannot launch out into untried seas. The obvious rejoinder to this is that it is the business of the vendor of an article to show it to us before he asks us to buy it; and that the companies would probably find the larger musical public rallying round them if they catered properly for it. So there has been much talk and much newspaper correspondence, but nothing more practical. Some of us have seen that the only solution of the problem was for some man of broader musical sympathies and a more daring imagination than those of the ordinary impresario to start doing the thing thoroughly well and hoping for the best. We thought that some day Covent Garden might be induced to send a troupe round the provinces after the London season had ended, or that some concert manager of experience, such as Mr. Percy Harrison, might try running an operatic tour as a diversion from running orchestral tours or prima donna tours.

It looks, however, as if the impetus is to come, not from London or Birmingham, but from Edinburgh. We might have waited till doomsday before any of our ordinary operatic companies produced the "Ring of the Nibelung" on a proper scale. It has been done during the past couple of weeks in Edinburgh, the motive force being Herr Ernst Denhof, an Austrian resident of that city. He has, of course, had incredible difficulties to contend against. Some of them were inevitable; others might have been avoided if the venture had not aroused, as schemes of this kind always do, the jealousy of people who will do nothing themselves, but are always ready to throw cold water on the plans of more earnest and energetic men. Nor, if report speaks truly, has Herr Denhof had the support from the Press of his own town that any man engaged in so fine a work as this should have been able to count upon with confidence. Some of the newspaper critiques upon the performances, indeed, even in Edinburgh, indicate that the critics have still a good deal to learn about Wagner and the "Ring"; even the plot, judging by the inaccurate summaries of it that appeared in one or two of the leading papers, had been hastily worked up by the scribes at the last moment. One intrepid writer actually informed the public that in the first scene of the "Rheingold" there was not only the gold on the rock, but the Ring and the Tarnhelm as well! This is magnificent, but it is not Wagner.

Yet in spite of everything, the performances—two cycles of the work have been given—were not only an artistic success, but so far a financial success that Herr Denhof contemplates a tour of the leading provincial cities in the autumn. Such little shortcomings as the performances exhibited now and then were entirely due to the smallness of the stage of the King's Theatre, or to the rather insufficient mechanical equipment of it, or to the inexperience of the stage hands. Mr. E. C. Hedmond worked wonders as stage director, considering the material he had to deal with. But though anyone who knew the "Ring" well and was familiar with other performances of it could see, by sundry little signs, that the people behind the scenes had their hands full, practically nothing went really wrong. For the rest one can only speak in terms of the highest praise of the performances, which frequently had a more complete unity than those that Covent Garden has given us in English during the last two or three years. An orchestra of eighty-two poured out a magnificent flood of tone that must have astonished the provincials whose previous notions of an operatic orchestra had been derived from what the touring companies have given them. Herr Balling, of Bayreuth, was a first-rate conductor, in whose hands the score was a mine of beauty and expressiveness. Miss Agnes Nicholls as Brynhilde, Miss Florence Easton as Sieglinda, Mr. Francis MacLennan as Siegmund and Siegfried, Mr. Frederic Austin as Wotan and Gunther, Mr. Thomas Meux as Alberich, Mr. Charles Knowles as Hagen, Mr. Sidney Russell as Mime, Mr. Hedmond as Loge, and Mr. Robert Radford as Fasolt and Hunding, all sang excellently and showed gratifying ability as actors, though several of them were taking the parts for the first time. The work of Mr. Austin was especially admirable throughout, not only vocally but on the intellectual side.

It would be too bad if these two cycles of the "Ring" were allowed to be the end of the matter. So much enthusiasm, so much courage, deserve a better fate than that. The question now is, will the provinces encourage Herr Denhof to bring the "Ring" to their own doors? Are Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds, and Sheffield going to show themselves less intelligent and less artistic than Edinburgh? It will be to their lasting disgrace if they do. The situation is simplicity itself compared with what it was a few months ago. The provinces have long wanted to hear the "Ring," but the enormous difficulties in the way of a beginning led to nothing being done. The beginning has now been made; the vast preliminary work of organisation is over, and Herr Denhof and his assistants have acquired much valuable experience. The other towns will profit by this. All they have to do is to show sufficient interest in the scheme to encourage Herr Denhof to go on. Will they do this, or will they show an indifference that will not only deprive them of the "Ring" now, but will effectually discourage any one from attempting to give it them in the future?

THE PLANNING OF GREATER PARIS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At the end of December last the permission of both Houses of the French Parliament was given to the increase of the municipal debt of Paris, and the Municipality of Paris are now committed to what is, without doubt, the greatest single scheme of municipal improvement that the civilised world has known.

This scheme involves the expenditure of 900,000,000 francs (£36,000,000 sterling), and this enormous sum will be raised as it is needed over a period of from fifteen to eighteen years by the issue of municipal loan stock.

The construction of new schools and improvements in existing schools will take 91,000,000 francs; new works and improvements in water supply 125,000,000 francs; construction, improvement, and repair of public hospitals 35,000,000 francs; and the reconstruction of abattoirs 40,000,000 francs.

For the improvement of roads and pavements and various improvements in the services of public lighting and street cleansing, 44,000,000 francs will be allotted, but it is certain that this great amount must be still further increased in order to repair the ravages made by the recent floods.

Paris enjoys the honor of being the first municipality in the world to devote a large sum of money to the definite purpose of fighting the "white scourge" of consumption. 30,000,000 francs of this great municipal budget are to be expended on "La lutte contre tuberculose." Half of this amount will be used in the demolition of insanitary dwellings, and the investigations of the municipal "Casier Sanitaire" will now bear most valuable fruit, for the municipal authorities have in the records of this department the life and death history of every house in Paris since 1894.

The improvement of existing promenades and open spaces, the completion of public squares and the creation of new squares and public gardens will take 15,000,000 francs, and improvements and developments in various public buildings 25,000,000 francs.

The central feature of this municipal budget is, however, the apportionment of 440,000,000 francs (£17,200,000 sterling) for improvements in the planning of the city.

The first great scheme of town-planning improvement in Paris was due to Baron Haussmann and his imperial master, Napoleon III. In 1850, the only streets of great importance were the grand boulevards, and these dated from the time of Louis XIV. To these Haussmann added the Boulevards Voltaire, Magenta, Barbes, Haussmann, and Malesherbes, the Rue Lafayette, the Avenue de la République, and many other broad traffic streets.

Haussmann found a Paris with narrow, crowded streets, and by a few bold engineering achievements—costing in all 180,000,000 francs—transformed it into a city which, to the visitor from England, has the appearance of a city of broad boulevards and spacious avenues.

The scope of the new scheme is thus described by the Rapporteur to the Paris Council on the budget—Councillor Louis Dausset:—

"It will be easy to summarise the character of this great project if for a few minutes we consider it to be complete. If we carry our imagination forward for fifteen years what do we see?"

"To begin with, great arteries for traffic have been created or lengthened. On the left bank of the Seine from the Place St. Germain de Près as far as the Seine itself, a broad thoroughfare gives traffic easy access to the right bank of the river. Not far from this new street the rues de l'Abbé, de l'Épée, de Bue, St. Jacques, de l'Ecole, and de la Madeleine are greatly enlarged."

"The Church of St. Severin, one of the most beautiful buildings in Paris, is freed from the wretched buildings—centres of disease and consumption—which formerly surrounded it."

"In the neighboring (13th, 14th, and 15th) arrondissements new thoroughfares have been constructed and old thoroughfares enlarged."

"On the right bank of the Seine even greater improvements have been made. The Central Wholesale Markets have been completed and the surrounding streets greatly enlarged to meet the ever-growing traffic to and from the markets. At the angle of the rue Drouet and the Boulevard des Italiens a large and handsome junction of roads completely alters the aspect of the living centre of Paris."

"For forty years the Boulevard Haussmann ended abruptly at the rue Taitbout; it has now, however, been carried through to the Grand Boulevard."

"In the 10th arrondissement the old prison of St. Lazare has disappeared, giving room for new streets and healthy houses."

The work of city improvement is, however, not to be confined to the centre of Paris, for great developments in the suburbs are projected, although provision has not been made for these in the present municipal scheme. Hitherto the growth of greater Paris has been hindered by the fortifications of the city. These are now obsolete, and their destruction is only a matter of time. Schemes for the laying out of the land at present occupied by these out-of-date defences have been carefully considered, the Paris Municipality are negotiating with the Government for the purchase of the land, and a municipal endeavor will be made to secure a large number of open spaces and various garden village developments.

The movement which in Great Britain has produced the Housing and Town-Planning Act (1909) has had its counterpart in France, and, as a result, the Beauquier Town Extension Act has been passed to secure the proper planning of all new housing areas, including those of greater Paris.

This Act provides that:—

"Within five years from the date of the passing of this Act each Urban District with more than 10,000 inhabitants shall prepare a town extension and improvement plan.

"This plan shall determine the positions of public squares, gardens, parks, and open spaces, shall fix the width of roads, their direction, the manner of constructing the houses, and, in general, shall establish the proper development of the town on hygienic and artistic lines."

"The plan, when prepared by the officials of the Municipal Council, shall be submitted for the approval of the Bureau of Hygiene for the Department in which the town is situated, and also for the approval of the Departmental Commission for the Preservation of Sites and Places of Natural Beauty or Historic Interest."

"These Departments shall then prepare and submit such observations as they may deem desirable. There shall also be kept open for a whole year at the Town Hall a public register in which observations and objections to the plan may be recorded."

"The plan when definitely finished shall be authorised by an order of the Council of State."

"If during the period of five years from the passing of this law a municipality does not establish a town extension and improvement plan, this neglect shall be remedied on the initiative of the Prefect of the Department in which the town is situated. The plan will then be made public in accordance with Clause 3 as above."

"The plan, when finally approved, shall remain in operation for thirty years, and must then be renewed. During this period of thirty years all extensions and improvements in the town must be made in accordance with the plan."

When the great scheme for replanning the centre of Paris has been completed, and the girdle of land now occupied by fortifications has been properly planned, Paris will have a good claim to the title of the most beautiful city in the world.

Whether it will also be the most healthy city will depend on the efforts of Léon Bourgeois, Jules Siegfried, Paul Strauss, and other housing and health reformers. These indefatigable workers for hygienic reform claim that, to build a Paris which shall be worthy of the great traditions of the French people, the densely packed areas in which the poorer citizens of Paris dwell should be vigorously dealt with and every unwholesome house destroyed. They state with truth that it is not enough to improve those parts of the city to which visitors come for pleasure and rest. The housing problem of the thrifty, hard-working Paris artisan must receive equal attention, and new and healthy dwellings replace the unhealthy dwellings which to-day act as veritable "foyers" of tuberculosis and other diseases.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY R. ALDRIDGE.

Letters to the Editor.

WHY SHOULD THERE BE A SECOND GENERAL ELECTION?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Many Liberal speakers are assuming that another General Election will almost certainly take place in a few weeks' time. This assumption grounds itself upon the belief that as Mr. Asquith has not obtained, in advance, from the King, guarantees for the creation of a sufficient number of peers to secure the passage of a Veto Removal Bill through the Lords, the King will decline to give this guarantee when a definite proposal embodying the views of the Ministry and of the Liberal Party in the House of Commons is brought before him. But to give currency to such a belief is surely both ungenerous and impolitic. It is impolitic, because a widely disseminated forecast of the kind will tend to bring about its realisation, and it is unfair to assume that because Mr. Asquith may have failed to secure the requisite assurances, in advance, the King will avail himself of a tactical error, if such it be, on the part of his Prime Minister, to make futile the election which has just taken place, and so prolong an angry controversy which can end only in one way, and which on grounds of high national expediency, should be speedily settled.

The request for guarantees will come before the King with an urgency and authority to which a second election can add little, if any, weight. It is not as if a new question had been sprung upon him. He will know that the present position is one which it is impossible should last. When the Conservatives are in power the country is practically under Single-Chamber rule; when the Liberals are in power, their measures are mutilated or rejected whenever the House of Lords considers that it will serve the interests of the Tory Party to destroy them. In 1906 and 1908 the most important measures of the year, which passed through the Commons with huge and unprecedented majorities, were destroyed in the Lords, while last year witnessed the crowning outrage of the rejection of the Budget.

The spirit of the Constitution, to say nothing of the elementary requirements of a self-governing State, demand that this condition of things should be changed. In 1907 Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman brought forward resolutions which, if embodied in legislation, would secure that the will of the House of Commons should prevail within the lifetime of a single Parliament. These resolutions were accepted by the House of Commons by a majority of 285, the figures being: for, 432; against, 147. Although these proposals were characterised by extraordinary caution, and fell far short of the demands of many reformers, they have been loyally accepted by all sections of the Liberal Party, and during the recent election, held the field.

We know Mr. Asquith's famous Albert Hall declaration that "We shall not assume office, and we shall not hold office, unless we can secure the safeguards which experience shows us to be necessary for the legislative utility and honor of the party of progress. . . . The will of the people, as deliberately expressed by their elected representatives must, within the lifetime of a single Parliament, be made effective." For the purpose of my argument it matters not whether the popular interpretation put upon the former of these sentences throughout the election, or the more restricted import since given to them by Mr. Asquith, be adopted. There is no ambiguity at any rate about the latter sentence. In either case, the King will have known that the continuance of a Liberal Ministry in office was dependent upon obtaining guarantees for the passing of the Veto Bill. If the Government are not to obtain these guarantees, the purpose for which this Parliament was elected will have been rendered vain. I refuse to believe that the King will decline to accept the mandate of the country as given at the recent election. The majority is sufficient in numbers for the work it has to do, and it has with it the most powerful forces of the State—the great industrial centres of the North of England and of Scotland.

Mr. Asquith has deprecated bringing the name of the King into this discussion, but consider what would happen if a second election were held. As a Member of Parliament said to me the other day: "When I go down to my constituency and ask for their mandate against the Lords, they will reply, 'We gave you that in January, why do you come again?'" The only answer that could be given would be that the King had refused to give the guarantees, without which the Veto Bill could not pass. No true friend of the monarchy would wish that the King's name should come into the struggle in this way. Even if a second election were held, what evidence is there that the country would be nearer a solution of the difficulty? Having regard to the very heavy polls at the recent election, it does not seem likely that one held in a few weeks' time upon the same issues would result in any great change in the balance of parties. If the Liberal majority were reduced to fifty, would the King give the guarantees, and, if not, how could the Government of the country be carried on? The Liberals would not assume office, and the Conservatives could not hold it with a majority of fifty against them. If, on the other hand, the results of a second election were the same as those of the first, or if the Liberal majority were increased to 150, would the guarantees then be given? If not, then a Parliamentary deadlock would arise, and the Government of the country pass into a condition of hopeless confusion.

The controversy has reached a stage in which neither Parliament nor the country will be satisfied with anything short of the limitation of the veto, and in which Liberal Ministers will not retain or assume office unless they have the power to secure the passing of the Veto Bill. I cannot accept the assumption that the King will be unwilling to give the guarantees; the facts of the situation point to the extreme un wisdom of taking a step which would inevitably drag the name of the sovereign into an embittered electoral controversy, and do more than anything which has happened for the last two generations to shake the foundations of the throne.—Yours, &c.,

THE LORDS AND A REFERENDUM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, in your last issue, after suggesting that the question of the veto of the House of Lords should be decided by means of a Referendum, says: "The country would vote definitely on that one issue. Each elector would be asked to declare on his voting paper whether he is in favor of the Bill or no, and it would be impossible for him to vote on any other question."

Surely, as Mr. Asquith is determined to resign if he cannot carry the abolition of the veto, most electors would vote Yes or No, according to whether they wished to have a Conservative or a Liberal Government in office.

The impossibility of an honest declaration of opinion on any measure, so long as the fate of the Government may conceivably be depending on your vote, is one of the curses of the party system of government, and it would surely come into play in the case of a Referendum, just as it does in the House of Commons.

It is well worthy of note in this connection that the only country in the world where the Referendum has been a marked success is Switzerland, and that in that happy land (the best-governed country in Europe, and the only real democracy in the civilised world) the party system of government is quite unknown. Party government and democracy are incompatible.—Yours, &c.,

March 7th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The suggestion in THE NATION of February 26th, and in Mr. Lowes Dickinson's letter in your following number that a Referendum on the veto of the House of Lords is the way out of the present crisis both seem to suffer from a failure to realise that the other side would have the choice of whether they would accept or decline the challenge, and if accepting, on what terms.

The Referendum must either be a mere consultation with the nation, or a portion of an operative resolution or Bill, which, if carried, would have the force of an Act of Parliament.

In the one case the Conservatives could well say that if the Government wished to obtain a vote of confidence from their Liberal constituents, they would not raise any objection, but that they did not propose to take any part in it, and, of course, would not feel bound by the result. In such circumstances the average elector, feeling none of the excitement of an election, would probably not bother to record his vote.

In the other case, that which Mr. Dickinson seems to contemplate, the details of the Bill would have to be settled before the Referendum was taken. It would, therefore, be open to the House of Lords to so amend it as to take the Referendum on the most favorable issue to themselves, and, inter alia, to provide that the Referendum must be carried by a two-thirds majority either of those voting or of the whole electorate. However we may talk about the revolutionary action of the Lords in stopping supplies, it will be difficult to persuade the ordinary citizen that a limitation of the veto is not an alteration of the status quo under the Constitution, and to resist an amendment that such an alteration should not be carried by a bare majority of votes.

But if not by a bare majority, by what majority? Two-thirds is a recognised fraction in local government and trade union practice. But have we such a majority?—Yours, &c.,

STRAUSS AND HIS ELEKTRA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I, as an old critic of music, and as a member of the public who has not yet heard "Elektra," make an appeal to Mr. Ernest Newman to give us something about that work a little less ridiculous and idiotic than his article in your last issue? I am sorry to use disparaging and apparently uncivil epithets as "ridiculous and idiotic"; but what else am I to call an article which informs us, first, that Strauss does not know the difference between music and "abominable ugliness and noise"; and, second, that he is the greatest living musician of the greatest school of music the world has produced? I submit that this is ridiculous, inasmuch as it makes us laugh at Mr. Newman, and idiotic because it unhesitatingly places the judgment of the writer above that of one whom he admits to be a greater authority than himself, thus assuming absolute knowledge in the matter. This is precisely what "idiotic" means.

Pray do not let me be misunderstood as objecting to Mr. Newman describing how "Elektra" affected him. He has not, perhaps, as much right to say that it seemed ugly and nonsensical to him (noise, applied to music, can only mean nonsense, because in any other sense, all music is noise) as Haydn had to say similar things of Beethoven's music, because Haydn was himself an eminent composer; still, he is perfectly in order in telling us honestly how ill "Elektra" pleased him, and not pretending he liked it lest his opinion should come to be regarded later on as we now regard his early opinion of Wagner. But he should by this time have been cured by experience and reflection of the trick that makes English criticism so dull and insolent—the trick, namely, of asserting that everything that does not please him is wrong, not only technically but ethically. Mr. Newman, confessing that he did not enjoy, and could not see the sense of a good deal of "Elektra," is a respectable, if pathetic, figure; but Mr. Newman treating Strauss as a moral and musical delinquent, is—well, will Mr. Newman himself supply the missing word, for really I cannot find one that is both adequate and considerate?

When my "Candida" was performed for the first time in Paris, the late Catulle Mendès was one of its critics. It affected him very much as "Elektra" affected Mr. Newman. But he did not immediately proceed, English fashion, to demonstrate that I am a perverse and probably impotent imbecile (London criticism has not stopped short of this), and to imply that if I had submitted my play to his revision he could have shown me how to make it perfect. He wrote to this effect: "I have seen this play. I am aware of the author's reputation, and of the fact that reputations are not to be had for nothing. I find that the play has a certain air of being a remarkable work and of having something in it which I cannot precisely seize; but I do not like it, and I cannot pretend that it gave me any sensation except one of being incommoded." Now that is what I call thoughtful and well-bred criticism, in contradistinction to ridiculous and idiotic criticism as practised in England. Mr. Newman has no right to say that "Elektra" is absolutely and objectionably ugly, because it is not ugly to Strauss and to his admirers. He has no right to say that it is incoherent nonsense, because such a statement implies that Strauss is mad, and that Hoffmanstahl and Mr. Beecham, with the artists who are executing the music, and the managers who are producing it, are insulting the public by offering them the antics of a lunatic as serious art. He has no right to imply that he knows more about Strauss's business technically than Strauss himself. These restrictions are no hardship to him; for nobody wants him to say any of these things: they are not criticism; they are not good manners nor good sense; and they take up the space that is available in THE NATION for criticism proper; and criticism proper can be as severe as the critic likes to make it. There is no reason why Mr. Newman should not say with all possible emphasis—if he is unlucky enough to be able to say so truly—that he finds Strauss's music disagreeable and cacophonous; that he is unable to follow its harmonic syntax; that the composer's mannerisms worry him; and that, for his taste, there is too much restless detail, and that the music is over-scored (too many notes, as the Emperor said to Mozart). He may, if he likes, go on to denounce the attractiveness of Strauss's music as a public danger, like the attraction of morphia; and to diagnose the cases of Strauss and Hoffmanstahl as psychopathic or neurasthenic, or whatever the appropriate scientific slang may be, and descant generally on the degeneracy of the age in the manner of Dr. Nordau. Such diagnoses, when supported by an appeal to the symptoms made with real critical power and ingenuity, might be interesting and worth discussing. But this lazy petulance which has disgraced English journalism in the forms of anti-Wagnerism, anti-Ibsenism, and, long before that, anti-Handelism (now remembered only by Fielding's contemptuous reference to it in "Tom Jones"); this infatuated attempt of writers of modest local standing to talk de haut en bas to men of European reputation, and to dismiss them as intrusive lunatics, is an intolerable thing, an exploded thing, a foolish thing, a parochial boorish thing, a thing that should be dropped by all good critics and discouraged by all good editors as bad form, bad manners, bad sense, bad journalism, bad politics, and bad religion. Though Mr. Newman is not the only offender, I purposely select his article as the occasion of a much needed protest, because his writings on music are distinguished enough to make him worth powder and shot. I can stand almost anything from Mr. Newman except his posing as Strauss's governess; and I hope he has sufficient sense of humor to see the absurdity of it himself, now that he has provoked a quite friendly colleague to this yell of remonstrance.—Yours, &c.,

G. BERNARD SHAW.

10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.
March 1st, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A lady once asked Mr. Shaw to dine with her. Mr. Shaw's answer was, "Certainly not; what have I done to provoke this attack on my well-known morals?" or words to that effect. The lady's telegram in reply was as effective as it was quiet: "Know nothing about your morals, but hope they are better than your manners." I, too, hope so; for Mr. Shaw's manners, judging from this letter of his, are getting almost as bad as his logic. If I were to respond to his "appeal" to me in a spirit similar to his own, I should appeal to him not to talk so dogmatically and offensively of things he knows nothing about—for he confesses that he has not yet heard "Elektra"—and to control his bad temper and his vanity to a degree that will save him from too gross a parody of the case he is attacking—one does not expect, of course, too much from the man who has written about Shakespeare and other people as Mr. Shaw has done. I nowhere said that Strauss did not know the difference between abominable ugliness and noise, or that he is "the greatest living musician of the greatest school of music the world has produced." Mr. Shaw plainly does not know the difference between what he reads and what he dreams. To say that a man at times writes ugly music does not imply that at other times he cannot write beautiful music; and to say that Strauss's large and wonderful previous output, plus the wonderful passages of "Elektra," prove him to be the greatest of living composers (the "greatest school of music, &c., &c.," is the product of Mr. Shaw's own hectic imagination) is not inconsistent with the opinion that in recent years Strauss has sometimes done vulgar and stupid and ugly things. I hope this is clear, even to Mr. Shaw.

I shall be happy to discuss "Elektra" with Mr. Shaw when he knows something about it; and to discuss the general problem of æsthetic judgment with him when he shows some appreciation of the real difficulties of it. For a man who is always at such pains to inform the world that he is cleverer than most people, he really talks very foolishly—if I may be permitted to copy his own style of adverb. It is wrong for me to object to some of Strauss's music, even after careful study of it; but it is quite right of Mr. Shaw to say I am wrong, while confessing that he himself has not heard "Elektra!" But Mr. Shaw's logic was always peculiar. Look at some of the delightful deductions he draws from my article. I said that there was a lot of incoherent and discontinuous thinking in the opera. From this plain ground the industrious Mr. Shaw raises the following wonderful crop, which he puts to my credit: (1) Strauss is mad, (2) "Elektra" is the "antics of a lunatic," (3) Mr. Beecham and the singers and the orchestra are insulting the public by performing it. Prodigious logician! How does he do it? Mr. Shaw's ingenious theory is that I don't like some of Strauss's music because I can't follow it—his "harmonic syntax," for example. My objection to passages of this kind is not that they are opaque to my poor mind, but too transparent; and my general objection, as a musician, to some of Strauss's later themes and his combinations of them is that they are so ridiculously easy to write. But perhaps I am taking Mr. Shaw and his outburst too seriously. I quite agree with him that his letter—so rich in knowledge, so admirable in reasoning, so perfect in taste, so urbane in style!—should teach the musical critics something, even if only in the way that the language and the antics of the drunken helots were held to be useful for teaching the Spartan youths the advantages of sobriety.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST NEWMAN.

THE LIBERAL PARTY AND THE ESTIMATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Naval Estimates are a terrible disillusionment, and it is to be hoped that the more immediate crisis will not prevent supporters of the Government from saying so plainly. What is the use of laboring to popularise new methods of taxation if the whole product is to be squandered in a fruitless and unnecessary competition of waste? What is the use of unofficial efforts to create a better feeling between the British and German nations if the Government is to upset this work by the production, at a moment when the German Estimates are actually being reduced, of a programme which can only be called arrogant and provocative?

The main part of the increase of 5½ million pounds is due to the panic plans of last spring and autumn, never justified, and, indeed, based upon information which has been proved false. It means that the £40,600,000 of this year will increase to something like 45 million pounds in the next two or three years. Where is the next extra five million pounds to come from? The programme means the destruction of every reform involving large expenditure for which the present Government stands. It is a betrayal of promises made and expectations encouraged by almost every member of the Ministerial majority. If it is persisted in it means, when the emergency task of curbing the Lords is done, a wholesale desertion of the present Front Bench for some sounder leadership.—Yours, &c.,

G. H. PERRIS.

A POLICY OF THOROUGH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—We all feel the need of unity in fighting the House of Lords, but the unity must be real. If our unity be only a superficial make-believe, and not built upon a solid foundation of mutual understanding, it will fail us again when the storm comes, as it soon will. Why did it fail before? There was no disunity between the branches of the democratic force—Liberals, Labor, and Irish—but between all these and the Cabinet, and it would be blind folly to ignore the fact that this grave danger still exists, and will continue to exist until the democratic party chooses its own leaders, which as yet it does not. Had it done so, the great opportunity of 1906 would not have been frittered away. In the meantime the Irish and other stalwarts have saved us, and it is to them that we must look for leadership. Let them rouse the country and formulate in unmistakable terms the people's demand. The withholding of supply has already put the enemy into fear and confusion, and this policy must be maintained at all costs till the Veto is settled. It is already evident that with this weapon we can win if we have only courage enough. We should insist on real guarantees, and resist with all our might the feeble contention that there is any need at all for another General Election.—Yours, &c.,

THE BUDGET AND THE WHISKY DUTIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“The Lords have no backing in the country, and no popular force exists as an obstacle in dealing with them.” These are your own words, and I agree with them. I am confident that there is in the country a much greater resentment of the Lords' intrusion into the forbidden realm of finance than is represented by a majority of about 120, and, in looking for the reason why the Government was not returned by a much larger majority, I have come to the conclusion that the 1909 Budget forced a large number of voters into what may only be temporary opposition. Speaking for the whisky trade (in which I am interested), I am aware that a large number of English voters were compelled to cast their lot with the Lords' party, not from any love for them, but from the feeling that they have a right to be allowed to live before being either Liberal or Conservative.

For some years there has been growing in the ranks of the more reflective members of our trade a conviction that, as our wares are sold quite as freely to Liberals as Conservatives, it has been bad business to allow our organisations to be so palpably political as they have been. Traders are known to me in London, Birmingham, Stockport, Shrewsbury, Kidderminster, Birkenhead, Leeds, and Nottingham, who were quietly endeavoring, as I have been, to remove from the trading associations their political bias, but the 1909 Budget did not leave breath in our bodies, and the movement is suspended for a time.

We have figures now which demonstrate that the additional duty on whisky had been bad business for the Chancellor as well as for us, and the same results may be anticipated from the imposition of the licence duties as proposed. Is it wise for the Government to persist in forcing friends into the enemy's camp for no pecuniary benefit to themselves? There is just now a very strong feeling of annoyance in our trade circles that the opposition to the Budget was most selfishly, as well as unsuccessfully, engineered in the interests of the land-owning classes. The real grievances of our trade were shamefully ignored in favor of the incomparably smaller grievances of the landowners.

Although my business is very hard hit under the Budget proposals, I hope I may be saved from having to accept temporary salvation at the hands of the Lords.

Protection would, in the end, be worse than the Budget, but people in distress are sometimes known to cling to straws.

In any case, I cannot support a Government which deals so unfairly with my business and doesn't help itself in so doing.

Let us have some fairness in the 1910 Budget in respect of our trade, and the 120 majority may easily be doubled at the next “time of asking.”—Yours, &c.,

THE KING'S ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The writer who discourses on “The King's English” ought to know that there is no authority whatever for the word “correctitude,” which he uses. The “New Oxford English Dictionary” does not even recognise the existence of such a word, and it appears to be a recent, and quite unnecessary, invention.—Yours, &c.,

THE CRISIS: A SUGGESTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Might I offer a suggestion? In common with every Radical outside the Cabinet, I think that “the Guarantee” should have been demanded as the first thing by the Government. And I would greatly wish to see the Referendum put in force.

But the most of us think that when the Lords kick out our veto proposals, the King will not give either “the Guarantee” or the Referendum.

And what then? John Redmond says yesterday that we shall have another election in a few weeks. And in that case there are two things which the Government must do. (1) It must now tell the House of Lords that it shall not have another opportunity of rejecting the veto; (2) and secondly, if it has a majority, it must at once insist on the exercise of the prerogative. And when a sufficient number of Radical life peers have been created, here you will have not only a sufficient instrument for forcing the veto through the House of Lords; but you will also have the instrument, the only possible effective instrument, for doing the next necessary thing, viz., the reconstruction of the Second Chamber. I write from a spot sacred to true Liberals of the latter days. From my gate I can see the grave of the revered and beloved “C.-B.” And it occurs to me that once again the mouse may help the lion.—Yours, &c.,

THE MEANING OF THE SCOTTISH ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I thank the “English Liberal” who describes himself as having “taken a small part in four English elections,” and also as having beforehand done some work amid the Scottish people. If I write, it is not simply to thank him, but also to correct him, especially as for two reasons he stands in need of correction, mainly because his history is at fault, and also because he manifestly thinks of the Highlands as Scotland, while I, who am a Lowlander, agree with Mr. Andrew Lang in thinking that the people who live between the Tay and the Tweed have been the actual makers of Scotland. I would, indeed, include more than the men living between the Tay and the Tweed. All the Eastern Counties I prefer. Mr. Lang, as becomes a Yarrow man, says, “A Selkirk, Roxburgh, Berwickshire, or Lothian man is probably for the most part of English blood”—that is Danish and Anglo-Saxon. Mr. Lang, indeed, speaks largely of the people as English, and says that Edwin, who was the rightful prince of Deira, then reigned over the English from Forth to Trent.

It is a great mistake to think the people of Scotland are purely Celtic. I claim to be as much a Scotsman as anyone, and I am no Celt. When Lang said “The English speech and laws were the germs of the Scotland of history,” he says what is manifestly right. I have then to explain that I am a Scot by birth, living one half the year in the north and the other half in the south country. I have, indeed, been trained to think of political questions very much as the Scottish people think of them, and my training has persisted in England, in spite of many influences that oppose Scotland. My grandfather, who lived before the days of comfort and through the hard times which preceded them, and which were due mainly to the operation of the Corn Laws, was a typical man of the higher yeoman peasantry. One of the things his daughter, who later became my mother, best remembered, was that when he was visited by the then local Earl, who had been appointed to canvass him and all his kind in the interest of the Corn Laws, the Earl said to him, "Laird, you will, simply by signing this document, increase the value of your land," and my mother, who was working with her father at the time, well remembered his look, as he replied, "I will never enhance the value of my land at the expense of the people's food," and the reply was characteristic of the man as well as of the time. It was characteristic of the time, for it said what the French Revolution believed and had put in circulation. It is to be attributed to Scottish Christianity, as well as to the nature of the man and his time. Still, if we think that not only was food so expensive in those far-off years, which are well named "hungry," but practically the food lay outside the reach of the common people, who had to live on barley meal and similar dainties. I can, for I have often heard of these days, tell a tale that would make men think twice before voting once, to bring back times so hard on the common race of men. We therefore see how every man who loved men, could not but speak a language that preferred their good to any amount of wealth.

I have said that I live one half the year in Scotland, and the other half in England, where, in the Midlands, I have had many and eminent opportunities of studying the contrast between North and South. The writer says that he thinks various causes have been at work in moulding the thought of the people, and he puts in the first place their religion. That is, I think, what they themselves would do, and were they accustomed to analyse, they would say that their religion is not a thing of polity and political framework, but of conviction. But he omits the very reason why the people are so religious. He thinks that the Free Church of Scotland—which came into being in 1842—has for nearly a hundred years been an educative force in the country. My memory and that of my ancestry goes back farther than the Free Church, and if we can ask why the people are so political and true to conviction we must think of many things, mainly of this, that there was a far older dissent in Scotland than the Free Church. I am jealous for it, because men I know were formed by it, and learned, before the Free Church was, to act in harmony with their convictions. It sprang from sincere religion, and was of the kind that disposed men to think of others more than they thought of themselves. The Scottish laborer who said, "We know now the value of the vote," really meant its value as regards the happiest of all states, the state according to the ideal of the Sermon on the Mount. "English Liberal" gives as a parallel the case of a young man who "kept a quite respectable and tidy shop." He replied to a suggestion, "If I cannot believe in the Birmingham 'Daily Mail' there is nothing left to believe in."

On this difference quite a multitude of moralisings may be built. We see why religion, which is a great factor in the life of the Scottish people, may have a far wider influence than the daily newspaper, which is, not only "a poor and sordid gospel," but no gospel at all.

I have to say about Birmingham that even where it is most partisan it is faithful to its color. One said, "I do not believe in putting a restriction on goods which would injure my own trade"—as much as cutting off one's nose to spite one's face—"and so I cannot support a cause that puts a restriction on the free entry of goods to this country"; but he added, "when it is made a party question, and as such formulated, I am not prepared to split my party or join the opposite camp; I have consequently no option but to adhere to my own party and its cries." That is a fair sample of the dominance of party spirit in the Midlands, a dominance we have to reckon with and overcome.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

FOUR POEMS.

By H.E. THE CHINESE MINISTER, LORD LI CHIN-FONG.

The Chinese originals of these poems are in eight lines of five syllables each. They are rendered into English verse by Mr. L. Cranmer-Byng, who has taken care to keep them as literal as possible.

SPRING.

WITH a gush of larks returns the Spring
And the swallow's tireless chattering.
The plough glides o'er the water-lands
And paper kites from tiny hands
In country lanes are seen;
While willows newly green
Loom through the haze, and bright with dew
The peach-bloom takes a tender hue
Like maiden's blush that half defies
The challenge of her lover's eyes.

Alas! in lonely room apart
A young wife frets her lonely heart,
And grieves for him she lightly sped
To follow where ambition led.

SUMMER.

Pomegranate blossoms fresh and bright
Now dazzle our delighted eyes,
And care's mosquito clouds take flight
Before the south wind's lullabies.
Now, while the spell of noontide lingers,
The round fan sways through listless fingers,
And our enforced idleness
Finds solace in a game of chess;
Till the vague breath of evening roves
Through windows shaded by green bamboo groves,
And o'er the pond where shadows shift and wane,
The lotus yields her fragrance to the rain.

Oh, harsh is June to those whom war beguiles!
Oh, fair is June to those who court her smiles!

AUTUMN.

From every tree rustles the dry dun shower.
How fair the parks in golden sunset's glow!
Over yon brow loom mountains capped with snow,
While moonlight silhouettes the storied tower.
Dew makes the song of the cicada faint;
The rare still air prolongs the crane's complaint.

Though winter's furred brocades seem far away,
The wanderer's thoughts fly homeward bound to-day.

WINTER.

Our honored guest, with sable cloak,
Sits radiant in the fireside's glow;
Without, black harbingers of snow,
The ravens croak.

Horses and winds across the hill
Mingle as if in mirth their neigh,
Yon chimneys cast in coils of grey,
The smoke they spill.

Now flashing through the forest deeps,
Red beacons light the quarry's lair.
Fling up the blind! O, pale and rare
The moonland sleeps!

Eastward the Pa Bridge faintly gleams,
Like silver arches spanned in dreams.

A SCHOLAR AND A THINKER.*

Few things are more pathetic than the slender gleanings of a scholar's work that has been cut short prematurely by death. The years of preparation, the sanguine forecasting of large schemes of work, the long laborious accumulation of materials, they take up the years. The actual unburdening of the stored mind is usually rapid enough; but the student has one gambling risk which he cannot avoid. He has to stake all on the chance that life and health hold till the end, for till the work is complete he is nought. It is not the poet who has most need to have

"fears that he may cease to be
Before the pen has gleaned the teeming brain,
Before high-piled books in character,
Hold like rich garners the full-ripened grain."

More tragic is the fate of the scholar who has nothing done till all is done, and dies leaving notes which, for all their value to the rest of the world, might as well have been written in cipher, while for him they represent nine-tenths of the matured work which it was his ambition to add to the thought of the world. The brief and unrevised paper which has been prefixed as an introduction to the new edition of Hobbes's "Leviathan," lately issued by the Clarendon Press, is, a short preface tells us, all that there is to show for the many years which the late Mr. Pogson Smith, of St. John's College, Oxford, had devoted to the elucidation of that thinker, and his position in the history of thought. Mr. Smith was a man of great powers, of whom high expectations were justly formed by a wide circle of friends, though the stress of that combination of the student's life with the teacher's, which some mistake strangely for a life of ease, broke him down before the threshold of middle age was even reached, and of his special work nothing remains but this fragment, vigorous and full of character in a measure to justify the expectations formed of the author, but, of course, the merest crumb from the store of his knowledge.

We will quote two passages in confirmation. The first compares Hobbes as a stylist and Bacon, "that bourgeois Machiavelli":—

"Bacon wrote to display his wit; Hobbes to convince and confute. Bacon invented epigrams to coax the public ear: Hobbes found his epigram after he had crystallised his thought. In short, the difference between the style of Bacon and Hobbes is to be measured by the difference between ostentation and passionate thought."

Unduly severe upon Bacon, perhaps, but undoubtedly a finely conceived defence of Hobbes, whose epigrams have the sort of terseness that belongs to formal logic and springs from the vigor of unadorned argument. They are pithy because they are precise, and are meant to convey what the argument has justified, so much and not a word more.

Hobbes was, in fact, what Mill described him, one of the "clearest and most consecutive thinkers that this country ever produced." Though with some claim to be considered the founder of the English school of philosophy, he was decidedly opposed to the characteristic methods of English thought—the only prominent man at all resembling him being, oddly enough, Mill's own father, who, like him, took up very partial truths and premises, and reasoned from them with much rigidity and consistency, and with little regard to empirical verification. This fearless one-sidedness is, in fact, the root of Hobbes's strength and his weakness. The result is well characterised by Mr. Smith in the second passage:—

"He offers us a theory of man's nature which is at once consistent, fascinating, and outrageously false. Only the greatest of realists could have revealed so much and blinded himself to so much more. You cry angrily: 'It is false, false to the core'; and yet the still, small voice will suggest, But how much of it is really true? It is poor, immoral stuff! so you might say in the pulpit, but you know that it probes very deep. . . . It is only the trick of the cheap cynic, you retort in fine. Yes, it is cynicism, but it is not cheap."

All this is well said. Hobbes takes up a position in which man, the individual man, is absolutely self centred, and he works out all its consequences with ruthless logic. At all points his results are, taken as a whole, profoundly false. Yet at hardly any point are they wholly false. They would not, if they were so, carry the sting which is actually felt in them. So far as the self throws its shadow—and it throws it further than we like to think—Hobbes's account holds, and granting that his conclusion is, as a complete statement, untrue and unjust, Hobbes challenges us all to find out where he is wrong, and to prove him so with a logic as coherent as his own. Take any of his well-known definitions:—

"Sudden Glory is the passion which maketh those grimaces called Laughter; and is caused either by some sudden act of their own that pleaseth them; or by the apprehension of some deformed thing in another, by comparison whereof they suddenly applaud themselves."

The two words, "sudden glory," have more of the just analysis of roaring fun, flashing wit, and keen humor than many a ponderous essay on the nature of comedy, and some of us may be won to a partial favor towards the rest of the definition by the fact that it is attributed to "them"—to those others who laugh when the wind carries off our hats, or when they see us from their snug corner puffing and panting after the starting train. Having "them" in mind, we gladly con over Hobbes's next sentence:—

"And it is incident most to them that are conscious of the fewest abilities in themselves; who are forced to keep themselves in their own favor by observing the imperfections of other men."

If Hobbes does not please us when we laugh, he gives us, let us thankfully acknowledge, a word of consolation when we are laughed at.

What Hobbes really confused was the thought of self with the mass of experience and feeling which makes up the working content of the self. His equally well-known analysis of pity suffers from that defect:—

"Grief for the calamity of another is called Pity; and ariseth from the imagination that the like calamity may befall himself; and therefore also is called Compassion, and in the phrase of this present time, a Fellow-feeling."

Here it is true enough that a sense of "being in the same boat" sharpens our feeling; but as far as real grief for the misfortune of another is in question, the reason is not that given by Hobbes. He would have us suppose a kind of reasoning whereby we conclude to a lugubrious anticipation of the evil fate of ourselves. This we should feel not as grief but as fear. Such an element of selfish fear may, in fact, be blended with pity, but this blend only confuses the psychological issue. The true influence of "self" in the matter of pity is that what we realise of the feelings of another is based on our own experience, or expanded by our imagination, and as in most men the imagination is feeble, we have difficulty in vividly interpreting in our own minds a misfortune which is very alien from anything which we have ever known. Those who have never known the pinch of poverty talk of it with complacency, and are rather attracted by the idea of a "simple life" that contrasts so refreshingly with their own overloaded experience. The man who has known the smart can feel what it is when it descends on the shoulders of another. It is the experience of one's self, not the thought of one's self, that comes into play, and it is want of experience, and still more of its god-given substitute, imagination, that accounts for nine-tenths of the callousness of the world. Human nature is less logical than Hobbes supposed, and infinitely more complicated and subtle in its emotional structure. But Mr. Smith is right. Hobbes is no satirist or egoist. He has merely taken up one element, the sense of self, the demand of self assertion, and has carried it right through the theory of human life and the working of the social structure. To do so was to set to all subsequent thinkers the task of deciding where precisely he was wrong, and what was the starting point at which he ought to have begun. Here is a problem of reconstruction which, after more than two centuries, still awaits a statement as clear, consecutive, and, on its own lines, convincing, as that of Hobbes.

A FRIEND OF SCOTT.*

"THE SKENE PAPERS" afford a most pleasing and characteristic picture of Sir Walter Scott. James Skene was a whole-hearted enthusiast for "the Shirra," and is content to efface himself, if only he can emphasise the indefinable charm of his "illustrious" friend. The present work, therefore, is not packed with good stories after the manner of Mrs. Hughes of Uffington, whose "Letters and Recollections" we are delighted to see re-issued in a compact shilling form; but, for a quiet picture, with the finer shades of delineation carefully preserved, of Scott as country gentleman and Tory magnate it could not, perhaps, be surpassed. It is a portrait of Scott as he showed himself to a man of like sympathies with his own.

* "The Skene Papers: Memories of Sir Walter Scott." By James Skene. Edited by Basil Thomson. Murray. 7s. 6d. net.

The student of Scott's life, which ranks with the lives of Johnson and Lamb as the finest cordial in the whole history of our literature, turns instinctively to Mrs. Hughes for evidence of Scott's buoyancy after the financial crash of 1826. He will turn to Skene for the discreet revelations of Scott's early ardors as a German student, a cavalry officer, and a Liddesdale borderer. Lockhart depends upon him implicitly for his account of Scott's ambitions as a Quartermaster of Light Horse. His devotion to his troop and his drill was so intense about 1797 as to provoke the unflattering comment from his lawyer friend: "Scott is become the merest trooper that ever was begotten by a drunken dragoon on his trull in a hayloft. Not an idea crosses his mind, or a word his lips that has not a reference to some damned instrument or evolution of the cavalry." Of course, "Earl Walter," as he then was, wrote the regimental song, and the whole of the fifth canto of "Marmion" is said to have been composed riding up and down the drill ground at Portobello on his charger, Lenore. It was three years before this enthusiasm, so amiably reflected in "The Antiquary," first took root, that Skene of Rubislaw (aet. 19) was first introduced to the young Writer. Associates at court, these young men had naturally much to tell each other. Skene was full of his school days at Hanau, and the rumors of revolution. He had a good knowledge of German, and was able to direct Scott in his callow Bürger-worship. Their close companionship reveals many delightful traits in Scott, and some of them would indubitably have been lost but for Skene. There are few more fascinating passages in Lockhart than the pages communicated by Skene on the Ettrick and Liddesdale excursions from Ashestiel. The best passages, it is true, have already appeared (this ought, perhaps, to have been indicated in the present issue), such as the breezy description of Sir Walter's amazing fondness for fords. He liked to be the first man to cross a ford after a flood. He would even attempt them on foot, and tell stories or recite a ballad upon a stone in mid stream. "Upon one occasion of that kind, I was assisting him to pass the Ettrick on foot, and we had got upon a stone in the middle of the water, when some story about a Kelpie occurred to him, which he stopped upon our slippery footing to relate, and, laughing at his own joke, he slipped off and pulled me headlong after him; so that we both had a complete drenching, to the great entertainment of Mrs. Skene and Mrs. Morritt, who were standing on the bank of the stream."

Scott's solemn affectation of innocence in regard to the "Waverley Novels" is so unmeaning to us now that it is difficult to realise how vigorously he disclaimed the authorship ninety years ago. Yet it can hardly ever have been much more than a pretence with Skene, who recognised at the early stage of "Guy Mannering" a German song put into the mouth of Dirck Hatteraick, which he had been made to repeat several times to Scott. He rebuked Scott for a mistake in the transcript, and begged him to inform the author, which that shameless pseudonymist laughingly promised to do. Scott's tenacity in this matter is hardly less remarkable than his amiability in regard to interruption, impertinent correspondence, and the other minor crosses of the literary life. He always, we are told, volunteered some jocular excuse for any waywardness or inconvenience to which anyone had subjected him. The two minor grievances that really stung him to a momentary flame of annoyance were, first, the bad treatment of one of his books, and, secondly, the inadvertent use of his particular pen. Alert as he was to the occurrences of a whole countryside, Scott was prone at times to extraordinary lapses of observation, and to that total absence of mind which is noteworthy in a few of his later letters. He had an aunt, Mrs. Curle, who lived in Jedburgh. He was assiduous in visiting her. About 1821 she moved her dwelling, but habit led him to the accustomed door. He insisted on Lady Scott going up with him to visit his aunt. The lady who now occupied the house happened to be at home, but in age and appearance she differed greatly from Mrs. Curle, who was a stout, burly looking piece of antiquity. Scott now saluted a wan-looking, shrivelled old maid, with a "How do you do, my dear aunt?" She rose in some confusion, to receive her unexpected guests, and, though Lady Scott at once perceived and tried to rectify the mistake, her husband proceeded to embrace the astonished old maiden, and addressed her again as "dear aunt," before she could make him realise the mistake of identity. He was greatly embarrassed then and afterwards at the recollection of such an incident.

Such traits are particularly interesting, coming from Skene, who had the faculty of admiration rather than the gift of intimacy. He tells us, too, a very interesting example of the way in which Scott, at a time when he seemed entirely preoccupied, absorbed every detail and hint about him, and was capable of embellishing a story from a grain of mustard seed until it resembled a monarch of the forest. Skene himself was instrumental in giving his friend some decidedly valuable hints. The incident narrated in the introduction to "Quentin Durward," the topography of that novel, the incident of the Vehmgericht, and the episode of King René of Provence, and much of the landscape in "Anne of Geierstein," are due to Skene's diaries and drawings. It was he who suggested the introduction of a persecuted Jew into "Ivanhoe," and who experienced the encounter with a phoca or seal, which Scott uses so effectively in "The Antiquary." We can hardly be too grateful to the man who was even remotely responsible for Isaac of York.

Skene's description of the poet's waning powers, his joy in Scottish earth, his last visit to the Hazelcleugh, and his deep grief at Erskine's funeral, when the tears rolled down his cheeks and he wept like a child—these things are told with much tenderness by an old man, to whom life was never quite the same thing again after "dear Scott" had departed. At ninety, his daughter tells us, one autumn evening he had a hallucination. Scott came from a very long distance to visit him. That must have been in 1865, when poor Skene's sense of the loss of his hero was almost as poignant as it was when in 1832 he fainted beside the open grave at Dryburgh.

These letters and documents are rather a mild draught of the fine champagne that was the spirit of Scott. Skene was not another William Erskine. But they are at least authentic, and they reflect for us the fighting Temeraire of letters, a figure that we all love, not only as one who stated incomparably, for all time, the ancient life of his native land, but also as one who was, individually, one of the most attractive and lovable of his species.

AN AMERICAN DIPLOMATIST.*

It is characteristic of America that the most definitely formative influences in its political thought should have proceeded, not from academic theorists or professional statesmen, or arm-chair philosophers, but from the daily and weekly Press. Among these influences none has been so definite and so distinctively American as that exercised for over half a century by the "New York Evening Post." It has never striven after popular circulation, has never pandered to the baser tastes of the public, and the ordinary American is apt to mention it with a disparaging sneer as the organ of "the superior person." But its impression upon the life and thought of the nation through the medium of the best minds has been incalculably great. It has stood for scholarship and principles among a people rather scornful of both as hampering to the freedom of a new world. These principles have been those familiar in Europe under the name of Liberalism, though naturally the concrete issues which evoked their application have made the course of liberal politics in America different from that followed in such a country as Great Britain. The political problems of the Civil War, with its emancipation and reconstruction policy, sound finance, and civil service reform, were distinctly American issues, though the Free-Trade and anti-Imperialistic attitude of this school of American Liberals has brought them into closer touch with European Liberals.

* "Retrospections of an Active Life." By John Bigelow, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of France, 1865-67. 3 vols. Unwin. 36s. net.

One of the most active men in the early days of the "Evening Post" was Mr. J. Bigelow, who carried with him through a long career of distinguished public service the sturdy principles which he formed and inculcated during the years in which he acted as joint-editor with Mr. W. C. Bryant of that great journal. To many readers of the three huge volumes of these "retrospections," the most attractive chapters will be those dealing with New York journalism at a time when C. A. Dana, Bayard Taylor, George William Curtis, and others whose names are written enduringly upon the literature of their country, were active pressmen.

But while still in early manhood, Mr. Bigelow, like so many writing men in the United States, was drawn into the public service as diplomatist, and the materials which occupy these volumes consist almost entirely of documents and letters bearing upon the foreign policy of America at a time when her relations with other countries were of a peculiarly delicate character. Mr. Bigelow represented his country at Paris, and afterwards at Berlin, during a period when a steady head, great energy, tact, and audacity were required in a minister, and his successful career entitles him to rank, as indeed he does, among the greatest public servants of the Republic.

To many readers the book will prove disappointing. It is in no sense an autobiography, for though the chronicle of public work is interspersed with casual glimpses into private life, there is no orderly attempt at a connected life story. Neither is it much occupied with anecdote or commentary upon the many important personages and external events which came within his experience as diplomatist. To tell the truth, Mr. Bigelow belongs to a serious, rather heavy type of American, very thorough, level-headed, and laborious, but not particularly interesting upon what is called the personal side. At the same time, it is evident that, like many men of this order, he had a great capacity for making and for holding friends, and upon occasion he showed real capacity in reading character and in penetrating masks. His earliest visit to Paris and London, 1858-60, brought him into contact with many men prominent in literature and politics. Russell of the "Times" was an early and an intimate friend, and Delane, Thackeray, Bright, and Cobden are among the men whose society he found most interesting. Here is a sketch of Gladstone in 1860:—

"He has the nervous, bilious temperament; black hair and bright black eyes; a square forehead, which does not rise as much in the region which phrenologists assign as the abode of the moral sentiments as one could wish; a rapid nervous motion, and everything about him rather more suggestive of a French or Italian than of a Saxon origin. His face is strongly marked with the lines of thought, and in his conversation he occasionally betrays the impression that his mind was pursuing a train of thought beyond the area prescribed by his interlocutor."

On his return from Europe Mr. Bigelow, abandoning his connection with journalism, designed to settle down to a quiet literary life. But the Civil War imposed other duties upon him. The meaning and necessity of that war were clearly discerned by him as the struggle for democracy against a privileged aristocracy, entrenched in power by the provisions of the Constitution, and the interpretations of the courts. Of Lincoln, at the beginning of his first Presidency, Mr. Bigelow records the strange impression of so devoted a friend as Senator King: "That he was not only unequal to the present crisis, but to the position he now holds at any time." His own maturer judgment is that "Lincoln's greatness must be sought for in the constituents of his moral nature. He was so modest by nature that he was perfectly content to walk behind any man who wished to walk before him. I do not know that history has made a record of the attainment of any corresponding eminence by any other man who so habitually, so constitutionally, did to others as he would have them do to him."

Mr. Bigelow's public career began with his appointment in 1861 as Consul at Paris, when he was entrusted with the important duty of watching and informing the European Press at a time when Confederate agents were everywhere busily engaged in poisoning public opinion in order, if possible, to secure European intervention for the South. Mr. Bigelow's Press experience stood him in good stead, and a full and interesting intercourse with Bright, Cobden, and the few prominent Englishmen who upheld the Northern cause from the beginning, forms an interesting feature in the book. Bright discusses as usual not only the detailed expediciencies of the policy, but the great underlying principles, and explains to Bigelow the reasons for the prejudices of our ruling class.

"It is a great mistake to imagine that our people are against your people. Our Government is made up of men drawn from the aristocratic families—it is therefore aristocratic, and, from a natural instinct, it must be hostile to your greatness and to the permanence of your institutions. Our rich men take their course mainly from the aristocracy, to whom they look up—and our Press, in London especially, is directly influenced by the Government, and the two sections of the aristocracy for which it writes—we have also our tremendous military services with all their influence on the Government and on opinion. But we have other and better influences—the town populations—the nonconformist congregations, the quiet and religious people, and generally, I believe, the working-man—these have done much to put down the war cry, and to make a very considerable demonstration in favor of moderation, and, if needful, of arbitration."

A remark made to Mr. Bigelow by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton when he learned that the Civil War was at an end expresses a view widely current in high quarters. "Well, I must tell you frankly, Mr. Bigelow, I am sorry for it. I had indulged the hope that your country might break into two, or perhaps more, fragments. I regard the United States as a menace to the whole civilised world if you are allowed to go on developing as you have been, undisturbed."

The real importance of these "retrospections," however, consists in the mass of official and semi-official documents for the first time exposed to the public eye. Mr. Bigelow flings them out in great slabs to form a quarry for historical researchers. Many of the documents throw strong light upon the financial, political, and military machinations of the Confederates in England and France, especially during the first two years of the war, when so well-informed a man as Gladstone could suppose that Jefferson Davis had made "a nation." How near to execution came the proposal for an intervention by the English and French Governments we learn from correspondence between Russell and Palmerston. Indeed, it seems probable that if statesmen had dared to face their peoples with a project to re-establish slavery in the Southern States, the Confederate design of European interference would have been consummated.

The last volume gives the inner politics of that amazing plunge by which Napoleon the Little strove to recover his waning prestige, the war with Mexico and the foisting of the miserable Maximilian on an imperial throne which he was utterly incompetent to hold. The entanglements of this tale of multifarious intrigue and treachery, with its tragic catastrophe, are set forth in the wearisome repetition of official correspondence, but even so the monumental folly of the story staggers the credulity of readers.

Mr. Bigelow, in these volumes, containing nearly two thousand pages, carries us no further than 1866. He has, we gather, many more boxes full of letters. If we might venture a suggestion, it is that he should make out of them a book. This he has not done here. There is no selection, no compression, no consideration for the brevity of human life.

RACHEL.*

For a chosen few among players, the gates of wonder have been opened. Of this shining fellowship was the Jewess Rachel, in whom the flames of genius and life itself were extinguished at thirty-eight. For Rachel also the gates of wonder were opened. Passing through them, with the mien and in the garb of Elektra, she drew light-hearted Paris after her, even to the confines of the Athens of Sophocles. For the scenes of Greek tragedy, when we recall the majestic spaces of the amphitheatre, the modern play-house is a mere back-parlor; but Rachel appearing, the stage of the Français seemed limitless and roofless. As she stood there with outstretched arms, the audience felt, says Mme. de Faucigny-Lucinge, "l'émotion sacrée qu'on ressent devant une statue antique," and when her voice rose in imprecations tion it must have been, in the tremendous words of the collect, "a sudden great sound, as it had been a mighty wind."

The career of Rachel is a measure of what genius will accomplish in the theatre. Her resources were almost solely those of the tragic actress, for though she could and did occasionally play in comedy, she could lay no high commands upon the comic muse. In tragedy, moreover, the realm in which she took natural and unchallenged station, her force and sway were definitely bounded. Those parts wherein she seemed to be deified at once by her own spirit and by the spirit of the antique drama were few in number. Rachel was essentially a classicist; and at the time when she was acting her noblest at the Théâtre Français (and when in fact she was the Théâtre Français), classicism was pretty nearly at the last ditch in the long struggle with romanticism. The influence of Chateaubriand had not spent itself; the influence of Victor Hugo, of Lamartine, of Musset was still passing through the whole of French literature; and the influence of the youngest of the three schools of the romantics, represented chiefly by the exquisite Gautier, was already felt and relished. Alone, the Jew girl from the gutter, thin, consumptive, demoniac, kept her classic lamp alight. De Quincey, reviewing the talents of some Grecian orators, speaks in his magic way of the "naked quality of vehemence." Rachel is largely, though not wholly, in that phrase. By her naked quality of vehemence, joined, of course, with many other qualities, she, an alien in a hostile field, upheld the worship of the classic for sixteen years, in the Paris of all the romantics.

A Jew girl from the gutter! Yes; this was Rachel, and this was what she was. Not by origin nor by association had she any link with the theatre. There are and have been Thespian families upon the members of which the very fact of birth confers a kind of right to the perilous calling of the stage. But Rachel was no more dedicated to the footlights than Garrick was or Irving was. She fought for the place that she had first accidentally stumbled into. From the tattered days of childhood she was a delightful and indisputable proof that genius will be served. What a titillating, poignant picture we have of her trotting up and down the boulevards, harp in hand, and edging her way with fierce, bright shyness into cafés. "Are you cold?" asked old M. Choron, her first befriender. "Yes; but I'm a lot more hungry." To Paris she had come with her Hebrew parents; Hebrews whose slender commerce with the world drove them to be wanderers upon the face of France, and almost mendicants. The father was a pedlar, "marchant ambulant"; travelling here and there, gipsywise, in a little cart. Something lured him to Paris; and in Paris it was that the child Rachel began to kick her heels up, singing and improvising; not in frolic, but to gather coppers for the common store.

On one of her nightly rounds the child was met by Choron, eminent music-teacher, and no laggard in philanthropy. This benefactor's death, soon after he had placed her in his school, sent Rachel home again, and probably again to the streets. One day a neighbor lent her a volume of Racine ("Not that you'll find much in it, dear, I'm afraid!"); and in this the muse of fire spoke at last to her. But like the Peri at the gate of Eden she stood long disconsolate. The hawkers, water-carriers, and out-of-works round about where she lodged knew quite well that the child of Judah was a genius, but could hardly force the theatre for her. She managed it all by herself, beginning at a shabby little concert-room, where she was seen by one of the people of the Gymnase Theatre. This discerning person took Rachel to the manager, Poirson, who seems at once to have recognised in her a recruit to be enlisted. Poirson brought her out in a piece imitated from Sir Walter Scott. This was in 1837, when Rachel was scarcely more than sixteen.

Poirson was something more than an astute manager; he proved himself to be also a man in whom the traffic of the stage had not frozen the current of the soul. He saw where the débutante's future lay, and calling her into his room one morning, he said: "My dear child, I am proud of you, but I do not wish to circumscribe your talent. There is a greater stage than mine for you. Tragedy is dead at the Comédie Française; you shall go there and call it back to life." In a year from this date, on June 12th, 1838, Rachel, not yet eighteen, was applauded on the boards of the House of Molière. "Rachel était transfigurée," is the author's suggestive summing-up. Dr. Véron, one of the best and raciest gossips of the period, said that the young actress, unknown the night before, "revealed herself in a flash"; and that eccentric character, Barbey d'Aurevilly, went about proclaiming "la grâce incorporelle de Rachel, la Psyché Rachel, la Psyché presqu'ailée."

But though this Psyche might indeed, as d'Aurevilly said, have wings, she was not in one night borne by them into her true empyrean. A woman's work, observed a gentleman at a Cambridge Commencement (how he came to say it there one knows not), "is never done"; and the statement is doubtless very true indeed of the woman whose work is play-acting. But Rachel had character as well as genius, and effort in her craft was natural to her. To revive Racine and Corneille, for audiences that had tasted of the modern art of Hugo, Dumas, and Alfred de Vigny, must have meant, in the case of so young and inexperienced an actress, an immense deal of study and practice of the severest technical sort; and Rachel, like many another great performer, had sundry defects to get rid of. Her power and truth of gesture seem almost from the first to have been quite wonderful; and she had the expressive Israelitish features that carry emotions across the lamps before the words are spoken; but her voice in her younger days lacked flexibility, sonority, and variety. She developed it into an organ that must have been well-nigh perfect for tragic utterance. Here is an interesting note by an anonymous English critic of the last century:—

"By careful training her originally hard and harsh voice had become flexible and melodious, and its low and muffled notes under the influence of passion possessed a thrilling and penetrating quality that was irresistible. When excited, her plain features became transfigured by the glow of genius, and in her impersonations of evil and malignant emotions there was a majesty and dignity which fascinated whilst it repelled. Her facial elocution was unsurpassable in variety and expressiveness, whilst the grace of her gestures, and the marvellous skill with which she varied her tones with every shade of thought and emotion, were completely beyond criticism."

In London, where she came three years after Queen Victoria's accession to the throne, and in Russia, Germany, Austria, and Holland, the magnetic Jewess was fêted and almost adulated. Signal everywhere, though chiefly, of course, in her own country, were her social triumphs. She divined the world, one may say, as she had divined the theatre. Intellectual and artistic Paris had a lively and deep regard for her; and in salons the most exclusive of the Faubourg St. Germain (at least until she had electrified the town by reciting the "Marseillaise": what one would give to have heard this!) she enjoyed a homage that was manifestly genuine. They say it was a delight merely to hear her speak. ("Madame," said the Comte Molé to her at Mme. Recamier's, "vous avez sauvé la langue Française"); and her air and manner in private displayed nothing of the portentous Grundyism of our splendid Siddons, who asked for porter in blank verse, and eyed an unattainable mustard-pot as it had been the urn of Orestes' ashes.

Born at a poor Swiss inn in 1820, this daughter of Israel and the gods died of consumption, at Cannet, near Cannes, in 1858. In the history of the French stage there are two imperishable names: Talma and Rachel; and as the woman was (we fancy) indisputably greater than the man, so is her renown so-day. So far forth as the stage can immortalise, they are both of the immortals.

IN DEFENCE OF THE FAITH.*

In the introduction to this little book, Dr. M. E. Sadler writes:—

"The lectures printed in this volume were delivered, under the auspices of the London Inter-Collegiate Christian Unions, in St. James's Hall, London, during November and December, 1909, to audiences of men and women students of the University. They are now issued in a convenient form for use by those who desire to study the fundamental problems of the Christian Faith. . . . Lectures like these leave the mind ashamed of lingering among half-beliefs. They impel it to a decision."

We cordially echo Dr. Sadler's tribute to the vigor, courage, and independence with which Mr. Temple has treated this great and difficult subject; and we may add that his lucidity of thought and simplicity of language make the book delightful reading. In a course of popular lectures to young people, printed as they were delivered, it would, of course, be foolish to expect an exhaustive treatment. The demand for definiteness of impression requires a certain dogmatism of statement, which a sympathetic reader will gladly overlook, while hoping that so fresh and striking an argument as is here presented may before long receive a more adequate exposition. Some of the chief difficulties of Christian faith, such as those that attend belief in prayer and in miracles, are here scarcely noticed at all.

Christian apologetic has moved far since the days when science and historical criticism were regarded as hostile forces, and the only question seemed to be what remnants of territory they would leave for Faith to occupy. Modern apologists, like Mr. Temple, have turned them into allies, and their territory, with full self-government, is now part of the imperial domain. There is a striking change, also, in the universality of the appeal that can now be made. Formerly, the divisions of Christendom gave a powerful weapon to the hostile critic. To those who desired him to accept Christianity, his easy answer was, "Which? Is it to be Catholic or Evangelical, Calvinist or Mystical?" Each creed seemed to be defending itself by arguments that destroyed the others. The outward divisions persist, but the inward separation is breaking down. And the reason clearly is that truth is one, and that its fearless and honest pursuit leads by many paths to one goal. Opinions and practices separate; facts and truth unite. As William Penn wrote long ago, "Humble and devout souls are everywhere of one religion." There is very little in Mr. Temple's argument that betrays his color, or that need be unacceptable to Christians of whatever hue.

The strongest feature in his method of dealing with the subject is the way in which he weaves together lines of argument in four strands, showing how they support one another. These are: Personal religious experience, the necessities of philosophic thought, the facts of history as revealed by critical study, and the witness of the Christian fellowship. These are brought to bear on the fundamental contradiction between reason and experience. Reason demands that the world shall be a coherent system; the presence of evil makes it, as experienced, a chaos. What is to resolve this hopeless and apparently irreconcilable antagonism? Nothing, urges Mr. Temple, but Christianity—with its revelation of love as the ultimate principle of the universe, and of atonement as the means whereby good is brought out of evil.

The argument will appeal differently to different minds; but it is worthy of the respectful attention of all seekers after truth.

A SATIRE ON JOURNALISM.*

THIS is a satire on journalism, and the victims of Mr. Montague's bitter wit lie strewn about every corner of Fleet Street. No type is spared; neither the old-fashioned party newspaper, Tory or Liberal, nor its successor, the merely "yellow" journal, trading under the motto of "patriotism," much as a saddler or costumier blazons his shop front with the Royal Arms. Mr. Montague finds them all guilty of the crime which he cannot pardon, the false coining of words. He assails these offenders with extraordinary brilliancy and vindictiveness, chases them out of every corner of refuge, and in the joy of exposure makes almost a serious hero of his comic villain, a kind of Captain Shandon, plumped down in a Manchester newspaper office. His novel gives you no rest; like "A Tale of a Tub," it harries every kind of game that flies, until the hunter has shaken the last feather out of the scarecrows of the mind that he pursues. The effect of this continual glitter of satirical writing is now and then a little over-dazzling, and we are not quite sure whether Mr. Montague's victims will understand it. But it is astonishingly good. Our only doubt is whether its author, in clearing the Temple of Journalism of the sinner who defile its outer courts, has not swept away the Sacred Edifice itself.

The main stuff of "A Hind Let Loose," is, we are afraid, one of the open secrets of journalism. Most of us know the bright spirit who is "on hire" to the party newspaper, and it seems a little invidious that both Thackeray and Mr. Montague should assume that he is usually an Irishman. In Fay-Moloney, indeed, he creates for his purpose a special variety of the type. We have known convinced Tories who have habitually written Radical articles, and Radicals who have spent the best part of their lives in a Tory newspaper office. "Mark Rutherford," for example, makes a brief, impressive study of such a man, who, with Radical sentiments, is "obliged to be violently Tory" in his articles, though he "draws the line at religion." But Fay-Moloney perpetrates the really dazzling wickedness of writing, on the same evening, the leading article (on the same topic) for the Tory "Warder" and the Radical "Stalwart," and presently illumines, to the same purpose, the new patriotic organ of everybody—Radicals, Tories, and a tertium quid. Thus Mr. Montague is able to drive home to the full-stop of his last chapter his thesis of the unreality of journalism. For see how Fay's impish talent has served his employers. Both to the "Warder" and the "Stalwart" this paragon of imitativeness has imparted the character which endears it to its readers. "The Warder" he feeds with good "John Bull" common-sense Toryism; into the "Stalwart," that acid regenerator of mankind, he stokes fuel appropriate to its Baptist soul. He even keeps up the Pott and Slurk polemics of the two journals: rebukes the "Warder" for its "Chinese torpor," and retorts on the "Stalwart" for its "compost of maudlin sentiment and gabbling abuse"; and all the time writes interchangeable articles, which will fit either into the Radical or the Tory slot. The game is only apparently up when Fay and Moloney are revealed to be one and the same person. Then the two editor-proprietors set to work to realise the journalistic "soul" that this rascally genius has improvised for them both. But the spirit will not rise: Fay-Moloney has "queered the pitch." His make-believe has come to be so much the real thing that the clients of Brumby, of the "Warder," write imploring him to "sack his wishy-washy windbag of an understudy," and give them again something from the fountain-head—"just a little plain, English common-sense, from someone who means what he says and says what he means," while voices in the train torture the listening Pinn, the Radical, by asking each other what has gone wrong with the "Stalwart"—with its "fat pi jaw about moderation"? The chorus becomes intolerable to both oracles, so they sneak off their tripods to Fay's shabby lodgings, and entreat him to come back to them both on his own terms, and give the people—both the peoples—"what they want." Even this is not the limit of Fay's triumph, for Roads, the "yellow press" organiser, is a third connoisseur of the unmeaning, and is so tickled with Fay's master-building, that he engages him for the journal that will make all Halland conscious of itself as "the second city of the Empire." So Fay pontificates for the three.

Mr. Montague's satire is the instinctive cry of the honest and able journalist, and if we take it to be written in mockery of party advocacy, the anonymous habit of our newspapers, and the whole mechanism of a cheap traffic in ready brains set up to counterfeit culture, we shall be the last to deny it point and efficacy. Dickens, Thackeray, and Trollope have done it before—"avec tendresse." Mr. Montague has no "tendresse." He is an implacable intellectualist, one of the most accomplished and truthful of political writers, and therefore, perhaps, the more contemptuous of the conventional pleading which any clever pen can imitate. It is certainly worth our while to inquire how it has come about that the business which once could hire Addison and Swift is now content to hire the "leader-writers" of the "Daily Mail." France has not come to that pass; and a balance of advantage would seem to rest with the system which, within the last four years, could retain as working journalists two men who have succeeded each other as Prime Ministers, and a third who will probably be Prime Minister before he dies. Why is much of our journalism so meaningless, so insincere, so open to Mr. Montague's taunt that any smart stranger can play upon its conductors and its public? And if the secret lies with the poor, backward taste and uncritical spirit that produced the old journalism, we are afraid the remedy does not lie with the new type which Mr. Montague scoffs at in this brilliant passage:—

"Going on with £150,000 in pocket, from strength to strength, he founded a daily paper, not for talented people and sportsmen only, but for everybody. Soon he had two—one in a Scotch city, one in an English; each when opened undoubtedly gave you a more poignant first sense of the appalling or intoxicating character of yesterday than any of the older journals offered for double the money. You might often think, from the way those niggards fobbed off their customers, that nothing seismic or cataclysmic at all had happened for twenty-four hours. Roads resented this slander on the richness, the diversity of life; no day but, as his paper showed, England was slapped in the face, by somebody, somewhere; no day but he rolled up Britannia's sleeve and said, 'Feel that biceps!' It kept your blood nicely on the boil. New worlds, too, came in to cover the bald places of the old, and our Mother England's broken and precarious flow of murders and connubial convulsions worth reporting was replenished from a score of tributary rills in Paris, Brussels, Vienna, and Melbourne; the lusts of New York and the homicides of California enriched for the first time the sacred home life of English families at their next morning's breakfast."

FOUR NOVELS.*

MR. EDGAR JEPSON is a novelist who is always interesting. Long ago—which is to say some twelve or thirteen years ago—he wrote a book called "The Passion for Romance," which deals in a vein of grave and yet vivid satire with certain passing follies of the time. He followed up this success with an enchanting fantasy called "Keepers of the People," which is in reality a panegyric on the extremest Toryism put in romantic form; later he invented "Lady Noggs," and while he was publishing the amazing achievements of this heroine, he wrote a little book called "The Horned Shepherd," which, as it seems to the writer, is quite an amazing achievement in the reconstruction of certain age-old mysteries. Now again, in "No. 19," he treats of the mysteries, and he has used his very considerable knowledge of such matters as the substratum of a tale of great sensational interest. The scene is laid in a mild and peaceful suburb of London, called Hertford Park, and thus is the note of the book struck in an early chapter:—

"One evening I sat waiting with one of the oldest inhabitants of the Park, Mr. Herbert Vincent, till a court should be vacant and we could play singles. We were talking as we waited; and presently he said, 'You live in the Walden Road, don't you?'"

"Yes, at No. 20," said I.

"Do you find anything queer about the road?"

"Queer? No. How do you mean?" I said in some surprise.

"Well, I can remember the time when every house in it was always occupied. But for the last five or six years it has been impossible to get people to stay in it. One family, at any rate, cleared out when they had been in it only two months, and went on paying rent for their house for three years; they lived at No. 18. Another family cleared out of No. 16 because they could not get a servant to stay with them."

"As I came down Walden Road I thought of what Vincent had said about its being queer. Truly, it was very still; and the fancy came to me that there rested on it the brooding hush which sometimes comes before a storm."

Now this passage very fairly indicates the task which the author has set before him. He has willed to enchant Suburbia, to summon the fume and flame of the abyss into a modern street, to make the trim lawn of a newly built villa the meeting place of those dark and surmised Powers that some believe to be the concealed inhabitants of material nature. Of course, it is easy enough to ridicule Pan; to declare that there does not exist, in rerum natura, a being of terror who manifests as half-man, half-goat. There is no such being; but the grotesque monster with horns and hoofs who does not exist, is the pictorial symbol of forces which do exist. The fashion of symbol changes; the old Greek image of Pan is obsolete these many centuries; but there are those who are inclined to think that the ancient mystery of Pan is rehearsed to-day under a very different symbol, and beneath less picturesque disguises. And, quite apart from its strong sensational interest, Mr. Jepson's story really states some highly interesting psychical questions.

While Mr. Jepson is concrete and direct, Mrs. Antrobus is abstract and allusive. "The Stone Ezel" was a huge boulder standing on the wild border of a wild northern village between moor and forest. For this monolith the country people had a vague but intense reverence and fear; as the author hints, it had possibly been the symbol of some forgotten religion, and still preserved a certain measure of its ancient sanctions:—

"There was, too, a dim idea of the Stone as a witness, possibly an avenger; so that the death, nearly two centuries before this present time, of a young and beautiful woman, killed by the hoof of a rearing horse, was held ominous to the family of the rider, her husband. Close by the great boulder she died, and her story, like all other stories of the Stone, was handed down from generation to generation of the long-memoried people of the soil."

The Vengeance of the Stone Ezel is the theme of the book; it falls on the guiltless descendant of the guilty Adye in a strange and terrible fashion. But the murderer of the last of the Adyes does not escape scot-free. He had fled to South America, but the avenger was on his trail:—

"And now, my dear friend," said the General, when dinner was over and cigarettes lighted, "what happy chance or design has brought you hither. Will you join us? A command—any command—is at your feet."

"A thousand thanks! Would that I could accept your generous offer, but my visit must be brief—too brief. I came from England to ask a favour."

"It is granted. Do I not owe life to you?"

"Well, I want one of your officers hanged."

"With pleasure. They all deserve it! Who is the man?"

So the murderer meets his deserts, and the last chapter ends on the note of happiness, with one of the old race once more in the old home of her fathers.

From these two books to Miss Crommelin's "Lovers on the Green" is a passage from one extreme to another. Mr. Jepson is all for terrors and occult mystery, Mrs. Antrobus has a tale of doom to tell; and Miss Crommelin has written a very pretty pastoral. "Cranford," that exquisite classic, must have served her as a model; the book is a picture of a village community whose habitations circle round "Gospel Green"; and with very considerable ingenuity, the writer, while affecting to be purely idyllic, weaves half-a-dozen pleasant little romances into one connected tale. The heroine, Serona Doyme, is the centre of the interest, she both witnesses and assists at the interludes that are played on the Green; and all the while, in the background, there is her own love-story, beginning in blank and hopeless despair, and ending with all fit happiness and good fortune. The episode of the three Belgian countesses and the gouvernante is really capitally done, and the final curtain—the discovery of the frumpish old lady's real station—comes as a surprise and a delight. And the affair of the Lee-Carters, of more serious import, is equally well managed in its way. "Lovers on the Green" is capital reading for any season, but it is above all a "holiday" book; it will be best read in a hammock under a tree, on a sunny August afternoon.

"They also Serve," by Christopher Stone, is a pleasant and interesting book. It fails in one way; the author impresses on the reader the philosophic depth and wisdom of Mr. Cotiller, a blind author. Now Mr. Cotiller is a most amiable man; he is in a way the "god from the machine" of a careful and successful plot; but his philosophy hardly strikes us as possessing the depth and significance claimed for it. Here is an example of the Cotiller system:—

"The mechanical business of life, such as administration, or cleaning boots, or holding services in churches, or law-suits, are only justifiable because they are mechanical; the child does not find them necessary, but since they are necessary, or at least conventional and not easily negligible, we teach the child all the domestic virtues, neatness and practical habits and concentration on trivialities. The wise man knows that these unavoidable trivialities can be relegated to their proper sphere, and in our Western ethics, so noble and strenuous in their lessons of unselfishness and chivalry, we can often find no better epitaph for a man who has never seen over the hedge than that 'he has fought a good fight.'"

Now we have here an old heresy—Manicheism—under a new disguise. The implied doctrine is that the spirit is everything, and that the body—the external—is nothing. And this is a proposition which must always be false, always productive of bad results both in body and spirit, in a world which is a compound of body and spirit. And then again we may question whether law-suits are mechanical, and whether a child can do without them. When Johnny smacks Dolly over a dispute as to the possession of an apple or a piece of chocolate, a nursery law-suit or criminal process is made inevitable; and, indeed, every law-suit is a civilised substitute for the ancient trial by combat. And, by the way, Mr. George Alexander may be astonished to learn, on the authority of Mr. Cotiller, that there are “several lines” in “The Importance of Being Earnest,” “which no lady would care to speak before an audience.”

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

M. PAUL FREMEAUX’ “The Drama of Saint Helena” (Translated from the French by Alfred Rieu and the Author: Melrose, 10s. 6d. net) is a thorough-going attack on the way in which Napoleon was treated by his English custodians, particularly Sir Hudson Lowe. That Lowe showed a want of tact and generosity can hardly be disputed. He was a narrow-minded man in a difficult position, and his behavior was due more to a fear that Napoleon might escape and to want of imagination than to malevolence. M. Frémeaux bases his work, which has been crowned by the French Academy, very largely on the testimony of the doctors who attended Napoleon when at St. Helena—Henry, O’Meara, Stokoe, Warden, and Arnott. It gives a good account of the details of Napoleon’s life at the time, and the impression left on the reader’s mind is that the trivial vexations to which he was subjected were as unnecessary as they were ungenerous, and that the ordering of them must have been almost as great an annoyance to the gaolers as to the captive. The case against the former would have been more effective if put with greater moderation. English writers are practically agreed in condemning the policy adopted on the island. M. Frémeaux himself points this out and remarks that, in the course of nearly a century, the defence of Lowe has only tempted two historians. He attacks one of these, Mr. R. C. Seaton, with especial vigor, and makes an absurd reference to Dr. Holland Rose’s life of Napoleon.

THE Money Market remains easy in spite of a much reduced Bank reserve, simply because the Income tax screw is not working. Hence the need for caution.

Much nonsense is talked about the horror which the Government’s failure to carry the Budget has produced in the minds of City men. Of course, nine men out of ten in the City hate the Government. But they hate it far more for introducing the Budget last spring than for not re-introducing it now. They would like it re-introduced if it helped Mr. Balfour to oust Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George, but not otherwise. In fact, the passage of the Budget would distress them very much, and would certainly hamstring the Trade. The loss of revenue this year, amounting to 28 millions, is due, of course, to the House of Lords; but you never hear the House of Lords blamed by the nine gentlemen I have referred to. The tenth will blame them, but the tenth is a Liberal. I should add that most of the people who would pay super tax are quite anxious that the ordinary Income tax should be immediately paid. Much pressure is being put on the Irish by the Trade and other rich and influential persons to vote against the Budget. Meanwhile the whisky duty must continue until the Budget is passed.

RUBBER PRICES AND RUBBER SHARES.

There is, of course, a very close connection between the rubber share boom and the extraordinary high prices which rubber is now fetching. The rate at which shares in new rubber companies are being subscribed by an ignorant and credulous public would speedily slacken if the price of rubber fell two or three shillings. But of this there is no sign. In the Rubber Sale Rooms, Mincing Lane, at the fortnightly sale on Wednesday, buyers, it is reported, were present in force, and the utmost keenness was displayed in the bidding. The largest quantity of rubber ever put forward was on sale, the total being a little over 200 tons or about 3,800 packages. The first proposal (“Smoked Sheet”) realised up to 10s. 6³/₄d. per lb., as against 9s. 10¹/₄d. a fortnight ago. Other grades met with good support at considerable advances. Of course, these tremendous prices mean tremendous profits for those lucky plantations which are already producing and have rubber to sell. But there is really no reason for thinking that the price of rubber next year or the year after may not be nearer five than ten shillings. And there is good reason for supposing (as many well-informed “bears” do) that speculators have been cornering rubber, so that there may be quite enough to supply the real demand

THE RUBBER BOOM.

The movement in the shares of rubber-producing companies really began three years ago, quietly and modestly, in Mincing Lane, where merchants, who knew what had been done in the tea industry, devoted their attention to the expansion of rubber production, and helped to supply planters with capital because they anticipated an ever-increasing trade. The actual speculative boom, however, did not begin until last December, and was the direct result of the upward rush in the price of rubber, which was yielding fabulous dividends to a number of existing plantations. There are now hardly less than two hundred companies with shares on the market, with an aggregate nominal capital of perhaps twelve millions sterling. But this capitalisation is not all, because many of the rubber shares are standing at premiums of several hundred per cent. Shares of one concern, for instance, with a par value of one pound sterling, started last year at £4¹/₂, and rose to £14¹/₂. And this hardly exaggerates the general movement of shares in rubber producing companies. But in these cases investors are on comparatively firm ground compared with those who recklessly buy shares in new companies, many of which are floated by unscrupulous adventurers merely to fill their own pockets. The new companies will get no rubber for five or six years, except where they buy planted estates at ridiculous prices ranging up to £500 per acre. So there is plenty of scope just now for a tremendous slump. It is significant that the lately floated rubber companies (about five come out every day) have not been much over subscribed. The public appetite has apparently been satiated.

THE STEEL CORPORATION.

Labor troubles in the United States, fear of Supreme Court decisions, the unpopularity of the Government, and other factors (especially new bond issues), are all adverse to Wall Street; but, of course, the fall in prices may have gone far enough for the present. But investors should be wary; for trade seems now once more to be declining in the States. Here, for instance, is the last report from the well-informed Pittsburg correspondent of the New York “Evening Post” on the iron and steel trade. As regards pig iron he writes:—

“The one thing evident to us at Pittsburgh is that sentiment in the trade is decidedly mixed. Trade journals this week referred to an improved tone in the pig-iron market, and then immediately contradicted the statements by pointing out evidences of weakness. The “Iron Age,” for instance, reduced its quotations on basic iron to $16 per ton, valley, while the “Iron Trade Review” quoted prompt at $17 and first quarter at $17.25 per ton, valley furnaces. Basic has certainly sold lower than $16, but not in sufficient quantity to establish the market; yet it seems evident that the tendency in iron is toward a lower level, both in the North and South.”

Then, with special reference to the Steel Corporation, he adds:—

“The blowing out of two Carnegie Steel furnaces, presumably for relining, and the backwardness of the Corporation in blowing in the two completed furnaces at Gary, reflect the situation accurately, and, in fact, further announcements of stacks going out to blast are expected here. The continued heaviness of coke, despite a 20 per cent. curtailment in production, is also significant, and curtailment of iron output, in line with the falling off in demand, is not only natural but prudent. Along with the weakness in iron, there are persistent reports of concessions in finished materials, and the fact that independent manufacturers are complaining that they are losing business to the subsidiaries of the Steel Corporation suggests that prices are being shaded."

This seems rather important, and it has inspired the "Post" to comment on the possibility of the dividend on Steel Common being reduced. Of course, the very existence of the Steel Corporation seems to be jeopardised by the decisions of the Supreme Court. New York financiers are much dissatisfied with the President and with Attorney-General Wickersham, who is now said to write bills before he has thought out the subject. It all comes of thinking that the tyranny of the trusts and of monopoly prices can be removed without removing the cause, which is the Tariff.

WARD, LOCK & CO'S LIST

NEW SIX-SHILLING FICTION.

BERENICE

E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

"Considering the number of contributions this author makes to fiction, 'Berenice' is a remarkable book. Its cultured style, powerful construction, and thoughtful passages, bear no trace of hasty composition. Mr Howard Somerville's illustrations, it should be added, enhance the attractiveness of the story."—The Scotsman.

WHITE WALLS

MAX PEMBERTON.

"There is plenty of incident of a kind that grips, and the whole tale is given with the verve and vividness which one expects from its author's pen. There are passages of really fine description, for which the scene of the story gives excellent scope."—Queen.

THE SUNDIAL

FRED M. WHITE.

"In the already extensive list of Mr. White's novels it would be difficult to find one superior to the present story in clever construction of plot, carefully concealed mystery, and a succession of most exciting and dramatic incidents."—Northern Whig.

THE SILENT BARRIER

LOUIS TRACY.

The author is here seen at his best, with Switzerland as a background and enough thrills to satisfy the most exacting. The New York Sun says: "No author writing in English to-day tells a better story of romance and adventure," and "The Silent Barrier" fully sustains Mr. Tracy's high reputation.

THE SPORTING CHANCE

ALICE AND CLAUDE ASKEW.

"The popular authors of this novel have imagined something new, even in the annals of the turf. Readers who follow Mostyn's adventures on the turf in this exciting book will be keen to know what, after all, was the result of his final effort to win his race."—Globe.

JOAN MAR, DETECTIVE

MARIE CONNOR LEIGHTON.

"Convict 99" seems never to wane in popularity, and any new story from the author's pen in which criminology plays a part is eagerly looked for by her admirers.

A KING IN KHAKI

H. K. WEBSTER.

The author of "A King in Khaki" has a broad human understanding and sympathy, and he has here produced a story teeming with exciting adventure and incident. This is a breezy, healthy tale.

WHEN THE DEVIL DRIVES

FLORENCE WARDEN.

Not since her famous "House on the Marsh" was published has Miss Florence Warden written a story so far above the usual run of her work as "When the Devil Drives."

THE HOME SECRETARY

WILMOT KAYE.

Mr. Wilmot Kaye is quite a new author, but he is one of considerable promise. "The Home Secretary" is confidently recommended.

JOY

"Joy is all charm and sweetness, spreading happiness around her, and deserving her name in every way. A delightful story."—Freeman's Journal.

FOES OF JUSTICE

HEADON HILL.

Mr. Headon Hill's work is always consistently good and interesting, and "Foes of Justice" is likely to be one of his most popular novels.

PRINCESS OF THE SNOWS

GEO. FREDERIC TURNER.

A story comparable to "Frost and Friendship" by the same author, which attracted considerable attention a few years back. It is a romance of the snow country of a high literary order.

THE MAN WHO ENDED WAR

HOLLIS GODFREY.

A story of much originality, and one of undoubted attractiveness.

LAWRENCE STERNE LAWRENCE STERNE

By WALTER SICHEL,
Author of "Sheridan," "Lady Hamilton."
With 7 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, 8s. 6d. net.
[Ready March 16th.]

Contains various Letters and Portraits hitherto unpublished, and a good deal of fresh material. The chief feature is the publication of "The Journal to Eliza" for the first time.

Mr. Sichel has written a brilliant impressionist study, in which he reveals Sterne's humanity, his "modernism," and the debt later writers are under to him.

Sterne is neither condemned nor whitewashed, but is revealed to us in his strength and his weakness—a very human character, wayward, impressionable, with all the advantages and disadvantages of the artistic temperament, but withal a true child of his times, and as such fascinating.

A NEW PENNY WEEKLY NEWSPAPER

No. 1

THE LITERARY POST

THE LITERARY POST is the title of a New Penny Weekly Newspaper to be devoted to the manifold interests of the literary and social worlds. It is designed to provide the public with a more complete survey of all that is appearing in current literature than is afforded by any existing journal. The production of an important or interesting book will be treated as an event of public interest, and the review of it will be more in the nature of a descriptive article on the subject-matter than a mere expression of the critic's opinions. Every effort will be made to avoid the more solid qualities of the weekly reviews, and to cultivate in the treatment of books the more popular interests without impairing the weight and value of the criticisms. In the leaders and topical notes reference will be found to all contemporary events which are worth discussion. Other prominent features will be signed articles by well-known writers; articles on varied subjects from authoritative pens; selected quotations from the best new works; condensed extracts from the world's Press of the hour; English, American, and Continental notes; a Financial Article by a trustworthy authority; and a list of the week's publications.

WRACK. A TALE OF THE SEA.

By MAURICE DRAKE.

"A glimpse of real sea life."—Pall Mall Gazette.
 "Those who have any of the British sea spirit in them will feel it thrill to this picture of the rude, wild life of the salvage vessel. It is good to have this depicted by one who is so much at home in the engine-room or the fore-castle, by the cofferdam or in the drowned hold. Mr. Maurice Drake has a gift of direct and vivid word-painting."—Pall Mall Gazette.
 "The book is forceful and clever. It is a tale of lawless men, lawless lives, lawless loves."—Observer.

"A novel of the coast and the sea (West of England) and full of the seamen's life, naval engineering, salvage work. Its nerve and fibre impress one."—Times.

"A good man's novel written for men. It goes with vigour and knowledge into the details of a ship's engineering plant, and the work of the men who control it, describing in an extraordinarily vivid manner the stern, tense life, the mastery of machinery, the domination of natural forces tethered to the will of man."—Globe.

"An able, well-conceived story, written so forcefully and simply that it might be a biography."—Daily Telegraph.

"The most remarkable novel we have come across this year. Admirable for the knowledge and imagination which are displayed in all matters connected with English shipping, and for the extraordinary skill in construction, condensation, and general literary economy of which Mr. Drake is an assured master."—Westminster Gazette.

Lady Helen Forbes' New Novel.

A STUDY IN POINTS OF VIEW.

In her new novel Lady Helen Forbes attempts to show the different characteristics and the attitude towards life of the English squirearchy and the Spanish nobility. The principal characters are three sons of a Spanish father and an English mother, and the life and fortunes of each is shown in detail. The book is effectively described as a study in points of view, and is of more than usual interest to the reader of modern novels.

Pure, delicate prose.

REST AND UNREST. By EDWARD THOMAS.

"It is a real delight to read such pure, delicate prose. All these impressions have at least one thought, one feeling, in common—the love of all things simple and pure and child-like; the hatred of all things mean, stereotyped, pretentious. They are the work of a mind as sensitive to beauty as a child, and as consciously critical of beauty as an artist."—Times.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

THROUGH AFRO-AMERICA. An English Reading of the Race Problem. By WILLIAM ARCHER. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready.] Whatever the point of view, it cannot but be admitted that social adjustment is one of the two or three most urgent problems of the near future, and this is the subject of Mr. Archer's book. In order to get into touch with the facts of the problem as it presents itself in Afro-America, Mr. Archer travelled those parts of the two continents mostly affected by the question, embracing New York, Washington, Memphis, New Orleans, Charleston, Florida, Cuba, Jamaica, Panama, Cartagena, Trinidad, and in his book has set down his impressions and conclusions. The book is dedicated to "H. G. Wells, with whom I so rarely disagree that, when I do, I must needs write a book about it."

FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

THE PASSIONS OF THE FRENCH ROMANTICS. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE, Author of "Chateaubriand and his Court of Women," "George Sand and Her Lovers," &c. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Shortly.] Mr. Francis Gribble, who has made for himself the position of England's authority on the love affairs of the French writers who were responsible for what is known as the Romantic movement across the Channel, tells in this book the story of the lives of those who created this movement. He does not criticise these experiments in life and literature or make apologies for them; he simply tells their story with the assurance that there is nothing unnatural in one's curiosity to know whether they failed or succeeded. The greater part of the material upon which he has based his book has only recently been made accessible in French. Here it is brought together, to help students to take a synoptic view of it, and to consider for themselves whether—or how far—the Romantics really served the cause of the liberty of the human spirit by that anarchism in their amours which was their common characteristic. The volume will be well illustrated.

RENE DOUMIC.

GEORGE SAND: Some Aspects of her Life and Writings. By RENE DOUMIC, Author of "Studies in French Literature," "Men and Manners of the Nineteenth Century," &c. Translated by ALYS HALLARD. With Portraits and Facsimile. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

This finely sensitive exercise in creative criticism first took the form of a series of lectures delivered before the Société des Conférences, in Paris, during the course of last year. M. René Doumic, of the Académie Française, is peculiarly qualified to estimate the work, and to interpret the life of this diverse and elusive genius, and his study will be found to be full of subtlety and sympathetic intuition. There are several portraits of interest, some of them of a rare order.

ALAN MACKINNON.

THE OXFORD AMATEURS. A History of the Drama in Oxford. By ALAN MACKINNON. With upwards of 100 illustrations, Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo, 15s. net. [In the press.]

This year marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Drama at Oxford, and the time seems ripe, therefore, for a history of the Oxford stage, from its first struggles for existence to its universal acceptance at the present day. Oxford has been a great recruiting ground for the professional stage, and among these lively records will be found the story of the first stage appearances of Mr. F. R. Benson, Mr. Arthur Bourchier, Mr. Holman Clark, Mr. H. B. Irving, and many other well-known popular favourites. The book is profusely illustrated, and no such collection of photographs of amateur acting has ever before been issued. The record is brought down to date, and includes details of the most recent revivals.

THE REV. H. N. HUTCHINSON.

EXTINCT MONSTERS AND CREATURES OF OTHER DAYS. By Rev. H. N. HUTCHINSON. With numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [In the press.]

Mr. Hutchinson's two well-known books on Popular Palæontology, entitled "Extinct Monsters" and "Creatures of Other Days," have become almost classic in their appeal. Published at different periods they have already run through several editions, and as the demand for them is still great, Mr. Hutchinson has combined the two volumes into one book, rewriting it in many places, and adding much newly gathered information. Mr. Hutchinson is recognised as the authority on the subject, not only for his scientific knowledge, but also for the gift he possesses of popular exposition. The volume will have several new illustrations.

LADY GROVE.

ON FADS. By LADY GROVE, Author of "Social Solecisms," "The Social Fetish," &c. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Lady Grove is known, wherever art and wisdom are appreciated, as one of the keenest contemporary observers of men and manners. In this bright and penetrating volume she puts a light finger upon many foibles of modern life, points out some weaknesses, and laughs away a few affectations. Her book overflows with good sense, and ridicules without lampooning.

KAMI-NO-MICHI

The Way of the Gods in Japan.

By HOPE HUNTLY.

The desire of the author is to guide her readers faithfully along this time-honoured, half-obliterated "Way of the Gods," clearing the path with reverent, not iconoclastic hands, because recognising it as the Way by which the Japanese were divinely led to their present mental attitude. The path is traced in three-fold aspect—Ethical, Philosophical, and Romantic.

The author presents the characters in the setting of their own harmonious environment, every scene of which she has personally explored.

MARRIAGE AND DISEASE

Being an Abridged Edition of "Health and Disease in Relation to Marriage and the Married State." Edited by Professor H. SENATOR and Dr. S. KAMINER. Translated from the German by J. DULBERG, M.D., J.P., of Manchester.

A quarter of a century has elapsed since Francis Galton drew attention to the urgent need for the foundation of a science and practice of Eugenics—that is, the improvement of the human stock. The monumental work of Senator and Kaminer undoubtedly occupies a very high place among works devoted to the elucidation of certain aspects of this important topic, and in the Abridged Edition an adaptation has been prepared for the enlightenment of the thinking portion of the public from which all purely technical and professional matter has been excluded.

On March 17th The Bodley Head will publish a novel entitled

ACCORDING TO MARIA

By MRS. JOHN LANE, with 10 Illustrations by J. W. GOFTON. Crown 8vo. Price 6s. ACCORDING TO MARIA has all the characteristics which made THE CHAMPAGNE STANDARD such refreshing reading. It has even more, for a story runs through the book, which deals with Maria's social aspirations. The love-story of Diana—her only child—is woven through the chapters dealing with familiar society functions and episodes, such as Afternoon Calls, At Homes, Wedding Presents, On Choosing a Church, Charity Concerts, Bazaars, the Royal Academy, and Prince's Skating Rink. Maria's unconscious humour pervades the whole book; indeed, each chapter abounds in the fun and amusing cynicism which is associated with the author's work.

OLIVIA L. CAREW.

By NETTA SYRETT. 6s.

The typical conflict in the life of the modern woman—the conflict between personal ambition and the ordinary claims of married life—forms the pivot of this story. A strong personality, which refuses to face the essential facts of the union between man and wife, leads the heroine to tragedy. And if the solution found at last for her approximates to a more conventional ideal, it is a conventionality not taken for granted, but discovered as the ultimate lesson of experience. It is a book to make one think.

Diary of the Week.

THE Lords are well at the bottom of the bog of "Reform" into which Lord Rosebery rashly plunged them. The Rosebery resolutions are to go to a Committee, but it is clear that the Tory Party will not look at them, and that in particular his two conditions, the first the elective principle, introduced through the medium of the County Councils and the Town Councils, the second the abandonment of the hereditary basis, will be struck out. What will emerge is impossible to say. Lord Halsbury is a greater power among the Tory peers than even Lord Lansdowne, and he says flatly that all the resolutions are bad, and the third—the anti-hereditary motion—the worst of all. Even Lord Curzon, the best friend of the Rosebery policy which the debate disclosed, accepted it with many qualifications, and the only point of advance seems to be a movement in favor of a strictly limited nomination of peers by the Prime Minister of the day. In other words, the old Dragon is to have a new coat of paint and a new kind of roar.

A MORE intransigent note was given out by Lord Salisbury, the Duke of Northumberland, and Lord Cromer, who was definitely for fastening the Lords' invasion of finance on to the Constitution. A mass of peers said frankly that the House of Commons called for reform more than the House of Lords, while Lord Curzon hinted that though Lord Rosebery might have a poor opinion of the Lords, "Potentates of Asia" and "Princes of India" greatly preferred them to the Commons. Lord Willoughby de Broke entreated them not to stultify themselves by decrying heredity. He had been a foxhound breeder all his life, and he was prepared to defend the hereditary principle in that or any other animal. The Duke of Marlborough thought that the hereditary and honorary peers, like youth and age, would never go together. Every speech, however, agreed in expanding Mr. Balfour's watchword of a "stronger" House of Lords—that is to say, of a House more certain to clash with the House of Commons than that which exists to-day. All again united to oppose the restriction of the Veto, which, said Lord Rosebery, would establish a "precarious, muzzled, and impotent phantom," fit only for Madame Tussaud's, and the principle of popular election, which, said Lord Rosebery again, would merely bring about a "feeble understudy of the House of Commons.

LORD MORLEY's speech supplied the one line of clear thought in this welter. It should be read by every Liberal, and sent broadcast throughout the country, for it is the only statement of the party's case with which the Front Bench has yet supplied it. The House of Lords, he said, had completely overlooked "the practical emergency," which was the Lords' invasion of finance and the dispute as to powers between the two Houses. The case for that invasion was now being destroyed. Last year the Lords claimed to be an impartial, impeccable House; now Lord Rosebery admitted it to be indefensible in constitution, and proposed to strip it of its rights and privileges. It first of all committed homicide by killing the Budget, and then suicide by denouncing itself as unfit. It was impossible to proceed with reform until the question had been settled whether the Lords were to be stronger or weaker than the Commons—the very point upon which Lord Rosebery's Cabinet Committee came to grief in 1895. It was idle to talk of the dangers of single-Chamber government when, for all the great purposes of government, the single-Chamber system existed now, while the proposal for a great, strong, and efficient second Chamber was merely a proposal to take back the extensions of popular electoral power. All the new elements, said Lord Morley, which the reformers would add to the House would be Conservative. The concoction of a second Chamber was an old pons asinorum of democracy, and where Cromwell had failed, it was not likely, hinted Lord Morley, that lesser men would succeed.

It is a pity that this powerful criticism, coming from the fullest mind in the country, was not in the view of Sir Edward Grey, who, on the same night, made a somewhat distracting speech to the City Liberals. He said, satisfactorily enough, that no limitation of the powers of the Lords could be too stringent for Liberal policy, and that that was the question of this Parliament. He insisted that the root of the mischief was the hereditary principle. This done away with, the Liberals must proceed to remodel the Second Chamber, for, if they confined themselves to a Single-Chamber issue without reform, the result would be "disaster, death, and damnation." For an hereditary Chamber he would substitute an elected one on a democratic basis. It should not be chosen at the same time as the House of Commons, or for the same areas. If such bodies came to a dead-lock, he should not mind.

SURELY this is dangerous doctrine. It might involve precisely the crisis in which we are at present engaged. The substance of Sir Edward Grey's proposal was probably that of a Second Chamber of 150 members, elected, like some local bodies, for differing periods, chosen, or partly chosen, on grounds of public service, and sitting together in case of a dead-lock. The method of election would probably be scrutin de liste. Such a body might clearly be a powerful rival of the House of Commons, and on this ground alone the Radicals, the Labor Party, and the Irish Nationalists are certain to oppose it. Thus the moment this "naked, new-born babe" of Reform leaves its crib in Downing Street, it will have to "stride the blast" of adverse criticism. Surely the Liberals can take warning by the House of Lords, now laboriously chasing the Apple of Discord which Hippomenes-Rosebery has thrown down to them.

MEANWHILE, Lord Lansdowne trimmed and pared down the Rosebery resolutions, finally reducing them to a copy of the report of the Rosebery Committee. The Tory leader would have nothing to say to (a) a small House of Lords; (b) a serious rival to the hereditary peers; and (c) an Imperial Senate. But he admitted that the House was "badly composed," and that it did not look quite so impartial as it really was. There might be a few more Liberals in it—just for the look of the thing—and a Liberal Ministry might be allowed to exchange the now unrestricted power of the Crown in creating peers for "some well thought-out and properly restricted scheme" of adding some of their supporters. In other words, Liberals are to give away the lamp of power now in the hands of the Crown for the rush-light offered them by the Tory leader. For the rest, Lord Lansdowne suggested a large but not overcrowded House mainly elected by the hereditary peers, with a thin sprinkling of Liberal nominees and new life peers, chosen on grounds of experience and position—in other words, a "stronger and more efficient" break-water against Liberalism than the present Chamber.

* * *

LORD CREWE scoffed at this dressed-up sham. Was not the House of Lords strong enough already, that it must be made stronger still? Did Lord Lansdowne contemplate anything but a Tory House, that would pass Tariff Reform and throw out land reform and land taxation? Clearly he wanted to retain power over Liberalism, only with a little more popular credit; to keep his Unionism and dispense with the control of the Crown. Finally, the Lords passed a reference of the Rosebery resolutions to a Committee, which will bury them with a few crocodile tears, and probably resurrect a second Rosebery Report in their place.

WE strongly hope that the differences of tactics between the Government and the Irish—there is very little between the Irish and the Liberals—are being composed. Speaking at Newcastle on Wednesday, Mr. Redmond promised that he would vote for the Budget "without the change of one comma," if the Government could assure him that they would be "able effectively to deal with the Veto." On the other hand, Mr. Asquith, answering Lord Hugh Cecil on Monday, said that it was the "intention" of the Government to "pass the Budget and get it through" before the House adjourned for the spring recess. This has been interpreted to mean a reversion to the abandoned policy of Budget first, and that, in its turn, means smash, with Liberalism dead against the tactics responsible for it. On Thursday night at the Irish National banquet

Mr. Redmond deplored the idea of a severance on tactics, and Mr. Dillon spoke of the Budget as one of the best democratic instruments ever forged for Great Britain, and only objectionable to Ireland in respect of one or two taxes. "Give us the Veto and we will vote for the Budget," he added. Certainly the Government are bound to put all their force into getting the Veto. If they fail, terms may, we think, be arranged on the lines suggested in our leading article.

* * *

ON Monday Mr. McKenna explained, without excusing, his 40-million Naval Budget, in a speech which was addressed almost entirely to the Opposition. He virtually put the responsibility on the Board of Admiralty, and challenged the Tories to dispute their conclusions, an improper and unconstitutional doctrine. He said nothing on policy, and would have dropped all reference to German shipbuilding had he not been challenged by Mr. Harcourt. He did not reaffirm his seventeen German "Dreadnoughts" in March, 1912, the legend on which these Estimates have been built, but, pressed on a following night, said that if Germany "accelerated" all her unbuilt ships of this year and next, and dispensed with trials, she could have seventeen "Dreadnoughts" in 1912 and twenty-one in 1913. Thus the fabric of a new scare is being woven as the tatters of the old one fall to pieces.

THIS attitude, and the insulting indifference to Liberal opinion, brought a torrent of damaging criticism on Mr. McKenna's head. Only 34 members voted for Mr. Lough's motion reducing the men by 3,000, for the party feared to wreck the Government, while they felt that they were being played with, and the situation with the Lords used against them. But in the course of a week's debate only one Liberal speech was delivered in support of the Estimates, and the general tone on the Ministerial side was one of grave and even bitter remonstrance. The Labor Party, through Mr. Barnes and Mr. Snowden, took the same line, Mr. Barnes ruthlessly destroying the pretexts of a general German acceleration and an Austro-Italian programme of eight "Dreadnoughts," and Mr. Snowden saying gravely that the impossibilist attitude of governments on the armaments question made organised Labor and Socialism the only living force for international peace. Mr. Macdonald's, Mr. Harvey's, and Mr. Ponsonby's speeches were specially impressive.

PUBLIC interest in the United States and Canada is concentrated on the Tariff negotiations, which have, so far, been unsuccessful. President Taft thinks he is bound to apply the maximum Tariff, unless Canada gives the United States some of the favors she has given France. But then the United States Tariff is very unfriendly to Canada, and Canada buys more from the United States than she sells. The Republican party is already unpopular, and is desperately afraid of a tariff war, especially the newspaper proprietors, who are expecting their wood-pulp supplies to be cut off or made dearer. What will happen if the wasteful and stupid hostilities are commenced, will be that the trade between Canada and the United States will be largely effected through England, which will be the entrepôt or shop in which they buy one another's products, our merchants and shippers taking their toll. This is more profitable than Colonial preference.

EVENTS in Germany are moving with unusual rapidity. On Monday, the Chancellor announced a Bill dealing with the Constitution of Alsace-Lorraine in the sense of conferring "greater independence." The Reichstag, at the instance of the Socialists, lost no time in passing by a narrow majority a resolution demanding autonomy for Alsace-Lorraine on the basis of universal, equal, and secret suffrage, with proportional representation. The formula, one suspects, was drafted with one eye on the Prussian conflict, which shows no sign of slackening. The demonstrations in provincial towns continue unabated. In the Landtag the Government's "Reform" Bill has now passed its third reading, but it has been turned inside out by amendments. The Centre and the Conservatives have combined to introduce the secret ballot, while retaining indirect election. This is theoretically a gain, but in practice will not do much to democratise the franchise. It means, however, that the Government will lose the power of coercing voters who happen to be minor officials.

ON Tuesday, the Reichstag, once more following Socialist leadership, took up the unfinished agitation against "personal rule," by passing a resolution in which the Government was invited to draft a Bill, establishing the responsibility of the Chancellor to it for his own acts and words, and also for those of the Kaiser, the responsibility to be enforced by impeachment before some special tribunal. The resolution is, of course, purely academic, but it bodes ill for Herr von Bethmann Hollweg's chances of carrying his Budget. On the same day there were made some significant references to Mr. McKenna's Estimates. Count Kanitz complained that "bad relations" between the two Empires continue, and that "Germany's peaceful assurances had been useless." Herr Scheidtmann for the Socialists threw the responsibility for the mistrust primarily on Germany, and declared that "the British Naval Estimates were really made in the Reichstag." It is the first principle of Socialist strategy to blame the native bourgeoisie, and Mr. Snowden said of our Jingoës very much what his German comrades say of theirs.

THE French are still absorbed in the exciting Duez scandal. The "evaporation" of at least £200,000 in the liquidation of the property of the monastic orders is admitted. The only question is now whether any of the three liquidators was honest. M. Lecouturier, at least, is hardly less suspected than M. Duez. M. Jaurès, who opened a three days' debate in the Chamber, rightly insisted that the real scandal lay (1) in the choice of such men for such a task, and (2) in the immunity they enjoyed, despite the fact that their robberies were suspected as far back as three years ago. Who was their protector? Scandal points at M. Millerand, who held a number of briefs as barrister for M. Duez. The official Radicals are trying to divert hostility to the Church, and suggest that it acted in collusion with M. Duez. That personage reserves his revelations. The "Figaro" translates the general attitude of expectation in a cartoon, which represents M. Duez in his cell meditating on the theme, "Whom shall I have arrested?"

THE Persian Mejliss still hesitates to accept the Anglo-Russian loan, burdened as it is with conditions which would ruin Persian independence. Meantime, Russia is tightening the screw. She has threatened once more to increase her garrison in Tabriz, which had been reduced to 500 men. Two versions of the pretext for this fresh aggression have been put forward. In the first, it is said that Russia demands the withdrawal from Tabriz of the two Nationalist generals, Sattar and Baghir Khans. They are, it is suggested, a menace to foreigners—an odd complaint when one remembers how scrupulous they were while they were the absolute masters of the town. The second version complains that two "bands" of 3,000 men are hovering near Tabriz. The simple fact is, we suspect, that Russia means to convey to the Persians that if they will not accept Russian money on Russia's terms, they will have to put up with a permanent Russian occupation. But the responsibility does not lie with Russia alone. Sir Edward Grey sanctioned the original occupation of Tabriz, and pledged himself that it should be temporary. He also has sanctioned the terms of the proposed loan, which are believed to accentuate the partition of Persia, and to subject all its armed forces to Anglo-Russian control.

MR. CHURCHILL, with his usual resourcefulness, has accomplished at a stroke the reform for which we and all Liberals have pleaded for years, and practically turned political prisoners into first-class offenders. We say "practically," for the formula adopted by Mr. Churchill is a little wide. He proposes that prisoners guilty of offences not involving "dishonesty, cruelty, indecency, or serious violence" should be subject to prison treatment which, in its turn, does not involve the meaner restrictions on personal liberty and dignity. This is a great advance, and we congratulate the Home Secretary upon it. It is not, however, quite complete. The prison system is so hard, and so tuned down to the most abandoned and wretched classes of the population, that it takes a good deal to suit it to well-meaning people, whose quarrel is with political custom, not with the criminal law. We hope therefore that Mr. Churchill will vigorously forward his predecessor's scheme of reform and add to it.

DR. LUEGER, the Burgomaster of Vienna, was buried on Monday, with almost Royal pomp, in the presence of the Emperor, the Duke of Cumberland, several Archdukes, and the representatives of the Pope and the Kaiser. As the creator of the "Christian Socialist," or, more properly, Anti-Semitic and Clerical Party, he had become the most valuable Conservative force in Austria, and the Crown was duly grateful. The son of a beadle, emphatically a man of the lesser middle class, he owed his popularity to his instinct for understanding the prejudices of the Viennese crowd. He destroyed the Liberalism of the 'seventies, which had never cared to become popular, rarely held public meetings, talked an academic jargon, and relied largely on the support of wealthy and cultivated Jews. He championed the "small man" and, above all, the little shopkeeper against the monopolist and the international financier.

* * *

LUEGER was German as against all other races, but Austrian and Catholic even before he was German. He led a feud against the Hungarians, whom he used to call the "Judaëo-Magyars," almost as fierce as his crusade against the Jews. It is difficult now to remember that when he was elected in 1895 the Crown refused to sanction the choice of Vienna, and yielded in 1897 only after his repeated re-election amid demonstrations which recalled the days of Wilkes. His first care was to break the hold of Jewish finance upon the city. He was a good administrator, and, despite his hatred of Socialism, proceeded, with complete success, to municipalise all the public services of the city.

Politics and Affairs.

THE DUTY OF THE LIBERAL LEADERS.

THE Government have arrived at a stage of their policy when they must take a decision of great moment, and, when taken, adhere to it. On one issue the ground has been cleared. The House of Lords have not waited to see the Government's proposals for abbreviating their powers; they have tacitly admitted that the body which grasped last November at the power of the purse cannot, in their present form, defend that act or abate the popular judgment upon it. As Lord Morley put it, the Lords first commit homicide on the Budget, and then commit suicide by admitting themselves unfit to do the deed. The House of Lords of to-day is dead; it may linger on, mummy-fashion, embalmed and enwrapped in the garments of the past; as a living force, it exists only in the imagination of men like Lord Halsbury. But the debate on Lord Rosebery's resolutions has taken us a step further. It shows that, sceptical as are the ablest champions of the Lords of their ability to face democracy, the House itself is unwilling and unable to reform itself. The Rosebery resolutions are still-born. The debates have revealed an indomitable pride of caste, which will tolerate no mixture with the base blood that Lord Rosebery's suggested vaccination with ichor from Little Peddlington would bring with it. The peers do not want to rub shoulders with new men who will "come in on a 'bus," with "a few lawyers and county councillors," as Lord Lansdowne contemptuously said. Democracy or no democracy, they stand by hereditary rule as a by-plan of the Creator, thoughtlessly thrown aside by innovating Man; and while they grope about for new defences and allies and subterfuges, they maintain their war on representative government, and mean only to arm themselves with fresh weapons against it.

In all this the Liberal Party, and, in spite of Sir Edward Grey's speech, we hope we may now say the Liberal Government, may divine the wisdom of its first and only policy. The House of Lords is at war with the House of Commons, with Liberalism and all its works, with democracy and democratic finance, with self-government for Ireland. It will not yield one inch in that struggle until it knows that its head, and not the head of its enemy, will fall; in other words, that the Crown is ready to exercise upon the peers, by the advice of its Ministers, the power which can alone restore the balance of constitutional rule, and give the Monarchy, as of old, the support of two alternative forms of government. It is a mere commonplace, therefore, to say that Veto must come first. Clearly it must precede any system of "reform"—for that will have to pass through the doors of the House of Lords, armed as they are with triple brass. It must also go before the Budget—for the Budget, important as it is, is a weapon and incident in this fight, not its centre and prize. Thus far all members of the coalition—Liberals, Labor men, and Irish Nationalists—are agreed. Nor is there, so far as the Budget is concerned, any alternative tactic. The debates of the week make it obvious that the Lords will not pass the Budget intact, and that their zeal to have it sent up to them is mere hypocrisy. When it goes, therefore, it should go as the second object-lesson for the electorate, already enlightened by the refusal to pass or to discuss the resolutions on the Veto. The country will then see the full meaning of this Revolution of the Rich, economic and political. But, like Mr. Redmond, we see no point in the House of Commons loosing its hold of the Budget before the Veto has been dealt with. A safe and wise plan would be, we think, to ask the House of Commons to pass it in its preliminary stages and then to send it up as the last act of a Government that has either got the King's assent to a creation of peers, or, failing that assent, is prepared to resign or to appeal to the electorate.

Is this plan one on which the Irish will unite with the British part of the coalition? We see no reason to doubt it. Mr. Redmond disowns opposition to the Budget as a whole on the ground of specific taxes. He declares his willingness to vote for it on condition of an effective dealing with the Veto. He has a heavy stake in this matter as well as we; for the hopes of Home Rule rest, not only on the disappearance of the Veto, but on the maintenance of good feeling between the British and Irish peoples. But a dissolution on the destruction of the Budget by Irish votes would mean that the Budget, and the attack on the Lords, and the hopes of Home Rule, would wither at a breath. For the defeat of the Bill "referred" to the electors by the Lords would naturally be taken as a second object-lesson, following on that of 1893, in the beneficence of an over-ruling House. Clearly, therefore, both sides have an interest in averting so wretched, so senseless, a catastrophe, and Liberals would not forgive their leaders if it came about on a line of tactics which they thought had been abandoned for a better one. All of us fancied that it was to be Veto first and Budget second, and we shall be surprised to learn that the Prime Minister's announcement on Monday has reversed the order. Mr. Redmond does, indeed, seem to go beyond this, and to suggest that the Budget should be dropped altogether unless, and until, the Government can produce the King's authority for a creation of peers. But what if it fails in this quest? Is it then to go empty-handed to the electors, confessing a double defeat, and with no new fact, no promise of better success on a second appeal?

Now, on this matter it is well to be candid. Grave events will follow such a situation, and no man can foretell their issue. But it ought not to occur; it is so bad a thing that it must not occur. Our leaders must not quarrel with the Irish without good cause; the Liberal Party must not allow them to quarrel. It is well to consider, therefore, whether we need reach a cul de sac. Is it not possible to ease the situation both for the Crown and for the Liberal Party and its allies? The House of Commons persisting, and the House of Lords remaining recalcitrant and irreformable, a state of revolution inviting counter-revolution, and the ultimate employment of force, is set up. A dispute as to powers has arisen between the two Houses, in which neither will give way, while the Crown will not, or cannot, act. We confess we contemplate this deadlock with great reluctance. If the Crown is properly advised, it ought not to happen. The King is a good constitutional Monarch, not a supreme and irresponsible over-lord. He acts through his Ministers. They, in turn, have a right to call on the Crown in certain emergencies, and we can imagine no greater emergency arising in a democratic State than the theft by the non-representative House, of powers belonging to the representative Assembly. There is every reason to believe that the King hated the action of the Lords last November, and a gross indignity to him is involved in the way in which the Peers have discussed their privileges and status without the smallest regard, direct or indirect, to the interests and powers of the Crown from which they derive. But if he does not act, the reproach lies with our chiefs, and it is gravely laid upon them to discover a way out of the difficulty. Saving the Crown, the only court of appeal is the nation. Should not the people be asked to settle this question by a specific reference, which could not in the nature of things become a precedent, for it would end the dispute as to powers, and lay the corner-stone of a new Constitution? In other words, why should not the Veto resolutions be embodied in an Appeal to the People Act? The House of Lords would refuse such a measure at their peril, and with consequences clear to the minds of all. Its rejection would mean that they dared not face the people, and that fact, in turn, must bring us within sight of the end.

THE ONE ISSUE FOR LIBERALISM.

THE reform of the House of Lords is eminently the subject for Lord Rosebery. It is a theme for the master of polished speaking. It gives occasion for the exercise of a certain pseudo-ingenuity in a region divorced from the harsh tests of practical reality. It affords an opening for the display of a Liberal and modern spirit in the castigation of archaic anomalies and indefensible privileges. At the same time, it offers a vantage ground for that superiority of mind which detaches itself from all that Liberalism and the modern spirit practically require. It shows what politics might be under conditions other than those which actually obtain. A set of circumstances may be quite easily imagined in which Lord Rosebery's speeches would have an important bearing on practical affairs. Unfortunately, they are never the circumstances which are actually found at the time and in the place where Lord Rosebery is speaking—a point which, among others, distinguishes him from great orators of the type of Demosthenes, Cicero, Gladstone, or Bright. In one point, however, Lord Rosebery is pre-eminent. When he wishes to justify a party, an institution, or a creed, he can always select some incident in his own career to which that party, that institution, or that creed has been opposed, and in which it has proved itself right, and Lord Rosebery has been proved wrong. Thus, on Monday, the most cogent instance that he could adduce of the wisdom of the House of Lords and the necessity of a Second Chamber was its treatment of the legislation, particularly of Home Rule, in which he bore a responsible part between 1892 and 1895. This kind of self-castigation Lord Rosebery is wont to administer with an apparent unconsciousness that the blows are falling on his own shoulders which recalls the most perfect type of Indian ascetic. It is altogether in keeping with Lord Rosebery's statesmanship that he should disclaim all intention of embodying his scheme in a Bill, and that the operative part of his resolution should, in fact, be limited to a single and to a purely negative suggestion. It is also instructive to find an ex-Liberal statesman crying out in horror at the suggestion that the House of Commons possesses that predominance in the Constitution which always belonged to it, and which, in words and in effect, he claimed for it in the controversy of 1895.

While Lord Rosebery's speech, if read in the proper spirit, will be found to blend instruction with amusement, the real point of the controversy was put directly and powerfully by Lord Morley, whose speech will, we hope, be framed and diligently read by his colleagues with their morning and evening prayers. Before approaching the question of reform, the thing to be determined is whether we want to make the House of Lords stronger or weaker. Now, the Campbell-Bannerman resolutions undoubtedly tend to make it weaker—weaker at least during the periods when a Liberal Government holds power. Under a Conservative administration we are already accustomed to Single-Chamber Government, and it is remarkable that, in dilating on the terrors of that system of Government, neither Lord Rosebery—who cannot sleep for thinking of what the Colonies will say of us if we should dispense with a Chamber of a kind from which they are happily free—nor Sir Edward Grey, who sees death and damnation in the Single-Chamber schemes, should have based their arguments on the practical experience of this country under the Single-Chamber system. They talk as though the Single-Chamber system were unknown to the civilised world except in Greece and Costa Rica. They forget the central custom of the British Constitution, under which the fate of Ministries depends on the vote of a majority of the House of Commons. Equally do they forget their own country under the recent Unionist administration. The Conservative Cabinet had, for the time, a power as plenary as that of most autocracies, and whatever check may have been applied to it did not come from the House of Lords. It may be added that, if there is one argument which appeals to the average Liberal in favor of a check on the Single Chamber, it is that derived from the dealings of Mr. Balfour's administration with the country between 1900 and 1905. It seems strange, then, that neither of these speakers should have touched on this point that lay under their eyes, until we remember that, by habit of mind, both of them are appealing to Conservative audiences, to the Conservative Press, to the Conservative forces in the Constitution. The type of Liberal statesman which relies on the applause of the opposite party has the problem of House of Lords reform well in hand.

But though personally accustomed to the contempt of his leaders for his most cherished convictions, the rank and file Liberal still expects of them some respect for the recent verdict of a General Election. It is at this point that speeches like those of Sir Edward Grey puzzle him most. Sir Edward Grey speaks as though the Campbell-Bannerman resolutions, the Albert Hall speech, and the General Election had never been. He treats the resolutions as leading on to a Single-Chamber system, and as involving, if not fortified by proposals for reform, the certainty of division in the party and defeat in the country, while if the problem of reform is left to the other side the result is to be, politically, "disaster, death, and damnation." In all this Sir Edward Grey is speaking as though he were considering a hypothetical case, something that never has arisen, and could only arise if the Liberal Party had lost its wits. He seems wholly innocent of the simple truth that he is describing the very policy on which his own Government agreed, the very policy which was put to the country at the Albert Hall, the very policy upon which the country dealt out to the Government, not disaster, death, and damnation, but a majority of 124. The very sense and substance of the veto resolutions was to avoid the immediate decision on the question of one Chamber or two, of the hereditary principle, reconstitution, or reform. The policy of the Government was to put this issue alone to the country, and to leave any question of reform open to the other side, "unoccupied" by proposals of its own. Far from resulting in disaster, this policy was approved by a substantial majority, and had the mandate of the people been executed without hesitation and without the raising of belated and inopportune suggestions, the difficulties of the present situation might have been avoided. We may, therefore, traverse every one of Sir Edward Grey's propositions by a direct appeal to simple and obvious facts. The anti-veto policy, promised for nearly three years, did not develop into a Single-Chamber policy. It did not necessitate the discussion of reform or reconstitution. It was put to the people. The advocacy of reform was left to the other side. The result was not disaster, but a substantial majority for the Government and its plan.

If the leadership of the Liberal Party is to be more successful in the future than it has been in the recent past, two elementary conditions must be observed. Our leaders must give more consideration to the feelings of their supporters and less to those of their opponents, and they must not shut their eyes to palpable facts, or expect us to do so at their bidding. It is with some effort and at the cost of some personal sacrifice to many of the rank and file that Liberal leaders are placed in power. They owe to their supporters in return some effort to carry out Liberal ideas, some sign that Liberal policy differs from Conservative, some proof that they rely on Liberal support and not on the applause of the Opposition benches and the Unionist Press. In the matter of the reform of the House of Lords, above all, the party had every reason to believe that the Government were united, clear, and determined in their policy before the election. The party went to the poll to support that policy, and it has listened to the interpretation of its verdict, given in such speeches as that of Sir Edward Grey, with sheer stupefaction. "Leadership" of this kind must cease, or the party will cease.

THE WOMEN'S CHARTER.

To those opponents of Woman's Suffrage who contend that the sex wrongs and disabilities admitting of legal redress are few in number and negligible in degree, the Women's Charter, drafted by Lady McLaren and discussed last week by the Lancashire and Cheshire branches of the Women's Liberal Association, furnishes an extremely effective answer. Inequality in divorce is claimed as one grievance among many. The legal structure of the family as regards the relation of husband and wife, the control of children, and of property, is biassed in favor of the man, while in the pursuit of a livelihood outside the home woman is weighted with legal disabilities which restrict her liberty, and respecting which she has never been consulted. As soon as Parliament is open to ordinary processes of legislation, it is intended to institute an organized endeavor to redress these inequalities by a series of closely related Bills introduced by Sir Charles McLaren and supported by prominent Radicals and Labor men. The whole doctrine of Coverture, practically suspending the civil existence of a wife and preventing her from taking legal action except through her husband or by his consent, is to be assailed. Not only is the right to maintenance to be legally enforceable, without application to the Poor Law guardians, but a wife is to have a legal claim on the income and the estate of her husband in respect of her work as housekeeper and nurse, and an equal share to the profits of a business in which they may be jointly engaged. When husband and wife possess property on marriage, a contract entered into by both is to secure a minimum contribution to the expenses of housekeeping, and limits are to be put upon the testamentary powers of the husband, securing his wife and family against total disinheritance, while, in case of intestacy, the survivor shall be equally secured, irrespective of sex.

These are the principal demands having relation to rights within the family. About their essential equity we entertain little doubt, and, so far as changes in our statute law can secure their due enforcement, we should give a general support to the Charter. Many well-meaning and genuinely liberal-minded persons will doubtless raise the objection that to make the relation of husband and wife the subject of close commercial contract, enforceable by law, tends to degrade the marriage bond into a mere cash nexus, converting all the natural dictates of affection and duty into the hard terms of legal rights. But this criticism, on the one hand, misrepresents the scope and nature of the legal intervention that is proposed, and, on the other, ignores certain grave, and even cruel, facts in the current working of the family. Laws are made, not for the good, but for the evil-doer. Although the normal marriage relation in every social class perhaps secures for the wife and mother a tolerable amount of personal control over the expenditure of income and the care of the children, the fact that she has no legal claim upon such control tells heavily against her in those numerous cases where the marriage has turned out unhappily, or where the superior physical and financial strength of the man is wilfully abused. At present, though a man is under legal obligation to maintain his wife and family, the wife has no effective and honorable mode of enforcing the performance of this obligation. Even where a separation order has nominally secured her an income, the difficulty of obtaining it, as evidence before the Divorce Commission shows, often compels her reluctantly to return to an unhappy union. Where a man fails to make a proper provision for his family out of his income, it ought to be possible for the wife and mother to secure an order for such maintenance without the degradation of an appeal to the Poor Law. The supplementary reform advocated by Lady McLaren, securing to the wife as a legal right the wages of a housekeeper, though in itself reasonable, appears to us very difficult of legal enforcement. If it be understood as a regular money payment, in addition to "maintenance," out of the weekly or other earnings of the husband, we can only say that its legal enforcement would be found impracticable. Lady McLaren, indeed, herself appears to realise the difficulty, arguing that "even if it could not be recovered by law from a husband, it might be a just charge on his estate after his death."

It is rightly contended that these provisions must not be regarded as merely applicable to the working-classes. Though the economic and moral status of the wife and mother in the better-to-do classes has undoubtedly improved, it falls in many cases far short of a reasonable standard, and there is much to be said in favor of the practice of marriage contracts placing at her disposal, as a legal right, a certain minimum for housekeeping expenses, suitable to the husband's means, and requiring from her a similar contribution should she possess property or be an income-earner. Though the enforcement of such legal rights might, and should be, rare, their existence would be of service, not merely in cases of extreme selfishness and neglect, but for the far more important task of reforming the general valuations set upon the status of woman and her work in the home. The failure adequately to realise the economic and social importance of the work of a wife and mother is chiefly due to the purely commercial standard of values which prevails. If the law acknowledged definite pecuniary values for woman's work in the home, and if her general rights over property and income were set on the same footing as man's, although the coercive powers of the law might seldom be brought into play, use and custom would gradually transform the whole conception of the economic and social position of woman, and the change would be attended by equally important changes in other aspects of sex relationship. Moreover, it might effect a very great improvement in the physique and morale of children cursed with drunken and selfish fathers. Only the other day, we heard (as many of us constantly hear) of the case of a man earning 20s. a week reserving five shillings for the support of his wife and family, and spending the rest on himself. Under German law such a state of things is not permitted. Why should we allow it here?

About some of the reforms which the Women's Charter advocates under the head of industrial equality, there will be more division of opinion among reformers.

Lady McLaren appears to favor the abolition of most sex distinctions in the Factory Acts, facilitating the employment of married women and mothers, removing the existing restrictions upon the night work of women, and in other ways putting the sexes upon the same legal basis of employment regarding hours, wages, etc. The issue is, of course, far too large to argue here. We can only say that, though some of the evils charged against the full "economic freedom" of women to work under the same conditions as men may have been exaggerated, any scheme of reform which proceeds on the assumption that the special functions of women as mothers and home-makers can be ignored in industrial legislation appears to us profoundly mistaken. We do not believe that the family wage is materially enhanced by encouraging the unrestricted competition of married women, and we are convinced that the diminution in efficiency of the home cannot be compensated for by a free development of crèches, and will be represented in a reduced efficiency of the health of the children. If these restraints, however, are imposed upon women mainly in the interests of society, the economic losses they involve ought, it is argued, to be compensated by society. This alternative, as far as it is practicable, we prefer to accept. The new policy of public health will be developed with due regard to these sex discriminations in industry, and though the public "endowment of motherhood" may be not directly feasible, under the more guarded form of protection of maternity and of childhood the paramount right and duty of society to safeguard the family will be realised with growing care.

THE SHAPING OF GERMANY.

TEN years ago the announcement that a Constitution was about to be granted to Alsace-Lorraine would have seemed to be an event which might transform the European situation. The hostility between the two great groups of Continental Powers was still a visible consequence of the annexation of these provinces. Around it still fluttered the shadowy flag of the revenge which was once more to extend the French frontier to the Rhine. Large as were the issues which united the two Alliances, it was never forgotten, even in Vienna and St. Petersburg, that the fate of the Rhine lands was the stake for which the partners might be playing in the game of high politics. In those days, Déroulède could still find a heated audience on the Boulevards when he perorated from the pedestal of Joan of Arc's statue about the lost provinces and the obligation to cherish the illusion of their re-conquest. There was always a chance that when next he seized the rein of some general's horse in the streets, he might contrive to guide it towards the Presidential Palace. The rivalry in armaments was as yet a military competition. It was for the holding or taking of European territory that the nations armed, and no one supposed that any acre out of Europe would ever seem worth the bones of a Pomeranian grenadier. All that has changed to-day.

If France and Germany have been near to war, it was over the penetration of Morocco that they disputed. The expedition to China heralded the opening out of a world horizon to German policy. Far less important than the traditional hostility of Germany and France across a land frontier, is the new rivalry between the British and German Empires on the sea. It is a naval competition which now devours the resources of civilisation, and the new factor in all the recent combinations is the island-Power which affects no concern in the provinces along the Rhine. Ten years ago a plan which may pacify Alsace-Lorraine and make of it a permanent and relatively contented member in the German federation would have marked a turning-point in European history. To-day it is an episode, important, indeed, and interesting as a German domestic event. But it will have no reaction on the grouping of the Powers and the ambitions of nations. No crowds follow Déroulède to-day.

One may doubt, indeed, whether the scheme of autonomy for Alsace-Lorraine, when Herr von Bethmann Hollweg unfolds its details, will deserve to excite even a sentimental thrill. Forty years have passed since the conquest. A new generation has arisen, resigned to its fate, and by no means discontented with its material destinies. To the plain man, it seemed, when Thiers signed the fatal treaty, that what had happened was that the people of Alsace had changed their flag. There were even then astute spectators who understood that what had chiefly happened was that they had changed their market. A region of coalfields and cotton factories had lost a stationary market on the West, to gain a larger and rapidly growing market on the East. The change involved a re-arrangement in the balance of German industries. It meant an even more important and more fortunate readjustment in the economic fortunes of the North of France. Mulhouse ceased to compete with Lille, and the Pas-de-Calais enjoyed henceforth a monopoly of the coal supply. It did not escape the notice of Thiers' critics that several members of his Government were directors of industries which lost a competitor while they wept a province. The new ties have cemented a union which no bond of sentiment has reinforced. Alsace-Lorraine acquiesces in the conquest, as Poland acquiesces in Russian rule, because a tariff has enabled her, nothing loth, to make the best of a profitable, if irksome, yoke. She has, indeed, maintained her attitude of protest in the Reichstag. She has kept up a guerilla fight for the maintenance of her individuality and her culture. The intellectual links with Paris were never wholly severed. For the right to use the French language, a steady, if unheroic, battle has constantly been waged. Sometimes the Church, sometimes the Universities, sometimes the theatre, and sometimes the school, has been its scene. But there never has been joined such a passionate conflict as the Poles continually maintain against the Prussian bureaucracy. Alsace presents none of the concrete problems which the Poles are destined to set to their German masters. She has no teeming population with an alien speech to flood the German labor market. Her lands have never tempted the Junker class to demand an Expropriation Bill. It is no rash policy which confers upon her in the fulness of time the right to govern herself. The tardy concession may be judged by English spectators by any standard which they choose to select. It looks ungenerous beside our treatment of the Transvaal; it is magnificent beside our handling of Ireland.

One can already foresee the part which the granting of this new Constitution is destined to play in German affairs. By a small majority the Reichstag has resolved that Alsace-Lorraine shall receive, in her new charter, the boon of the equal, secret, and universal franchise. To appreciate all the malice and point of that decision, one must recollect that this resolution was carried in the very Reichstag before whose doors, a week before, the people of Berlin were clamoring in the face of an outwitted police for this same privilege of a democratic franchise. The Chancellor cannot grant to a conquered and half-alien province what he refuses to Prussia itself. Yet if he should decide to invent for Alsace a "fancy," or anti-popular, franchise, he must face the criticism of a Reichstag in which he possesses no stable majority. The battle of the Prussian franchise, in which the Reichstag is not competent to engage, will be fought on the substituted ground of the Alsatian Constitution. The Chancellor has affronted and disquieted Southern Germany by his plain avowal that the class-franchise in Prussia is the citadel of the bureaucracy which governs the Empire. The South is taking its revenge. Last year the Centre, which is, in the main, a Southern party, had thrown in its lot with Northern Conservatism in the Budget struggle that rent the Bloc and ruined Prince Bülow. Already it is breaking away from that alliance. Some sections of it must have followed Socialist leadership in voting this symptomatic franchise resolution. Even more significant is their adhesion to the still more startling resolution in which the Reichstag called for a Bill making the Chancellor responsible to it for his own acts and those of his sovereign, and liable to be impeached before some Special Tribunal.

That resolution, like its fellow, is likely to remain a thunderbolt that cannot reach its mark. It will take more than a resolution to create Parliamentary Government in Germany, nor is it easy to imagine that, when it comes, it will be by the old seventeenth-century device of impeachment. But the passage of these two resolutions, amid the storms of the Prussian franchise conflict, is a proof that Germany is shaping rapidly towards change and reconstruction. The inner citadel of class-rule in Prussia was never so hotly assailed, and while that struggle rages, a more leisurely, a more decorous issue has been joined in the Imperial Parliament. The two struggles are parallel, and essentially one. The Empire would be transformed if Prussia were democratised. Prussia cannot be held if no Conservative Chancellor can maintain himself in the Imperial Reichstag.

A NEW STYLE OF PARTY LEADERSHIP.

TIME, which changes everything, would seem to have effected a rather serious modification in the manner of party leadership in the House of Commons. When I first frequented it, the political chieftain—a man of common, humdrum mind like Gladstone, or Harcourt, or Randolph Churchill, or Parnell—treated his friends much as the average general (say, Napoleon) treated his troops—that is to say, he thought for them, felt for them, worked for them, and (more than anything else) perhaps, kept them in good heart. This conception of policy lasted, so far as I can discover, down to the time of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, who put quite a considerable party victory to his account, and handled the resulting majority, as some critics consider, with rather exceptional skill and success. But, judging from two or three visits to the new Parliament, I should say that this type has disappeared. Mr. Balfour did something to put it out of fashion, but the true innovators appear to be the present Cabinet. The new method is to address your thoughts, your policy, and your speeches to the opposite side; to discover how cleverly you can appeal, not to the mob which put you in office, but to the patriots who want to turn you out, or, if brutally repulsed in this quarter, to turn to some shy and exquisite tertium quid like the Silent Voter or the Moderate Man. Superficially, such an attitude might seem to argue a certain want of responsibility in the statesmen who have invented it; and even to cast some slur on the strength and purity of their democratic creed. But I have no doubt that if it succeeds, it will be widely patented, and have an immense vogue in the drawing-rooms where Liberals (with the right adjectival prefix) are still tolerated.

But has it succeeded? Well, I have seen one or two examples which have not impressed me. I have seen half the enthusiasm and freshness of a new party drawn out of it before the Parliament had been a month old, and I wonder how it will survive a fresh tapping of its life-blood. I have seen a Government, or half of it, steadily thinking one way, and nineteen Liberals out of twenty thinking the other. I have seen Liberalism dropped into a pit of despondency by its natural leaders, and plucked out of it by the captain of an allied, but still an alien, army. All these feats have been accomplished by a Government dowered with ability above the average, and furnished with new blood as well as with stores of well-tested experience. These gentlemen assumed that the Liberal Party would hear with equanimity of the dropping of the policy of guarantees, of the substitution of Reform for Veto, and of Navy Estimates for forty millions. They know better to-day; and as they have it in them to do better, the situation may still be saved.

This week's example of the political method I have described was not absolutely new. Something like it, I imagine, occurred when Bright and Cobden were fighting Palmerston in order to keep Liberalism Liberal. Mr. McKenna, indeed, is not a Palmerston. In former days I knew him well. He was an excellent Secretary to the Treasury, almost morbidly keen on the offences of Admirals in the way of expenditure and the general worthlessness of "Service" ideas. I found him changed indeed; but, as he commended the most astounding Admirals' Estimates ever heard of, I found that he retained the good, clerk-like manner of which, a year or two ago, I had made a mental note as promising some useful check on the whims of these high-fliers. Either manner, or the possession of what Meredith described in Sir Willoughby Patterne as "a leg," seemed to shut out from Mr. McKenna's eye any mental view of the party behind him. Not for a moment did the First Lord of the Admiralty address himself to his friends. Here was a Government, whose chief had directly pledged himself to a swift reduction of the shipbuilding vote, proposing an increase of four millions for a single year, and opening up an increase of some ten millions in ensuing years. All men knew that much of the information on which this policy had been built had turned out to be false, though Mr. McKenna had made himself personally responsible for it. Most Liberals, therefore, expected a definition of policy and a reasoned defence of the Estimates. Neither was attempted. The mentality of the speaker was clear. He was thinking, not Imperially, but electorally, and his argument, such as it was, was directed to removing from a second election the shadow of the naval scare which, by his own word and act, had hung over the first. "Call us Little Englanders? Ship for ship, ton for ton, we build more than you. You dispute these Estimates? They are the Board of Admiralty's Estimates. Do you quarrel with them? Then you quarrel with the experts who fix our naval strength, and may be trusted not to minimise it." This was the argument, received without the smallest respect by those whom it hoped to conciliate or over-reach. For Liberalism nothing. For its electoral pledges, its historic ideas and hopes for the world, nothing. Of policy again, of the Government's aims, thoughts, and measurements of European forces—nothing. Mr. McKenna gave away the master-key of Parliamentary government, the superiority of the Executive over the experts, as coolly as Mr. Micawber handed his I.O.U.'s to Traddles.

Such an affront could not pass, and before the debate was over, the Labor men and the Radicals, weakened as they were, by their own cautious strategy, and the tremendous pull of the House of Lords controversy, had riddled these double-dealing estimates. Unfortunately, this process widened the breach between the Ministry and the most serious part of its following. Instead of taking fresh ground, Mr. McKenna worsened his old position. He had to listen without reply, or the possibility of reply, to two very grave criticisms of his statements of last spring and summer. He could no longer maintain the theory of seventeen German "Dreadnoughts" in March, 1912, on which our four "contingents" were built. And the still thinner fiction of a great outburst of Italian and Austrian "Dreadnought"-building was blown into the air. A stronger man might have admitted his double error. But then he could not have defended his Estimates. Their excess stood confessed. The Government were seen to be providing, in March, 1912, for twenty "Dreadnoughts" (plus the "Nelsons") to Germany's eleven or thirteen; though, in March last, they themselves laid down a margin of twenty to seventeen, added to our incomparable superiority in other types, as adequate. Before Germany can get even to her thirteen, the tale of our Imperial "Dreadnoughts" will almost certainly have gone up to twenty-two, or probably twenty-five. What could Mr. McKenna do to retain Liberal votes given solely on figures which were discredited, and now tacitly, and also avowedly, withdrawn? He chose to build up a new airy fabric of hints and inferences, as insubstantial as that which events have roughly thrown down. If the Germans "accelerated" all their construction for 1910 and 1911; if they built at their top speed (which Mr. McKenna had arrived at by subtracting from the German shipbuilding of 1906-7 the earlier delays which encumbered it); and if they did away with their trials, they "could" still have seventeen "Dreadnoughts" in 1912 and even twenty-one in 1913. Having thus made a handsome contribution to all these improbabilities by himself providing a strength in "Dreadnoughts" exceeding even two keels to one for the greater part of the so-called "danger" year, the Minister proceeded to double-bolt the door against economy and goodwill by setting up the narrowest kind of naval argument for the maintenance of commerce-destruction.

From such a competition in phantom-raising the not unresourceful Mr. Lee had to retire worsted. The legend of the false Teuton has again been revived by the Liberals for fresh use by the Tories, and in the absence of a miracle we are well on our way to a fifty-million Naval Budget. Mr. McKenna, indeed, has set a useful precedent to the inheritor of this rich bequest, for in the act of proposing his own Estimates he excused himself from the obligation to defend them. If therefore we do not get the Budget, the Government will have laid all these burdens on the nation's back, without a hope of relief and without the prospect that those who called the tune will pay their share of the piper's fee. This will be a material loss; let us all hope that we shall get off with the principles which are the stock-in-trade of Liberalism still intact.

Life and Letters.

TWO PEOPLE IN ONE.

WHEN it was discovered that Fiona Macleod, whose works are now being reissued by Messrs. Heinemann in complete and admirable form—when a few years ago it was discovered that this mysterious Fiona Macleod, whose name and style were like the mountain rainbow, was none other than Mr. William Sharp, a familiar figure in the literary circles of London, disappointment and vexation arose in many hearts. In Fiona there had been something so alluring that the very uncertainty increased the enticement. Her readers were puzzled. Even of those whose pride it is to talk about their friendship with authors, comparatively few had boasted of her acquaintanceship. The present writer, it is true, used sometimes to hear wild Highlanders from Edinburgh hint with dark rapture at a personal beauty that matched the intangible glamor of her works; but they usually admitted that they spoke only from second-hand report, or from photographs they had seen. And behind it all one could but dimly imagine a filmy creature of the furthest Hebrides—a wraith of wind-blown mist, a voice of many waters, a mountain rainbow. That was all we knew of Fiona Macleod, beyond our admiration for her books, and, except for curiosity, there was not the slightest reason to know more.

But some industrious investigator of literature began comparing and abstracting and putting two and two together until at last, just as the arithmetical Colenso, by totting up the ages of the Patriarchs found that the book of Genesis would not work out, so this investigator discovered that Fiona Macleod, rainbow of the western isles, was none other than William Sharp, a robust and conspicuous figure in London journalism. Sensibility suffered a shock. It was indignant at the discovery, and the public was more indignant still when William Sharp boldly denied the truth. He had a perfect right to deny it. In what form, or under what name, he will write, is an author's own affair. Scott, the very model of integrity, persistently denied the authorship of "Waverley," and William Sharp had far better reason for keeping his disguise. As his widow tells us in her introduction to the new edition, he used to say, "Fiona dies, should the secret be found out." Only under the seclusion of the pseudonym was it possible for him to pursue that line of creation, and the public has no more right to tear off a pseudonym than to tear off a woman's veil. There are many natures that can only work in disguise. Even Goethe, who was no shrinking personality himself, recognised the necessity of concealment in production. "Talent," he wrote, "is like virtue; you must love it for its own sake or not at all. And neither virtue nor talent is rewarded unless you can practise it unseen, as though it were a dangerous secret." But hide their own talents as authors may, the public is not accustomed to such concealment. It regards a pseudonym as a fraudulent trade mark, and has no more hesitation in tearing off its secrecy than in flinging filth at a Suffragette. So indignation increased, and it was thought monstrous that a man should be two people at once, and one of them a woman.

Yet if ever a writer had a claim to a pseudonym, it was William Sharp. When he was about twenty-three, he came from Scotland to London, and began clutching at the skirts of literature in the ordinary way. Like most writers, he wrote what he could get to write—journalistic essays, criticism, and biography, varied by one or two rather cynical novels of modern life, and, as he happened to write honestly and well, he earned a certain reputation besides a living. So it went on till he was nearly forty, and then there came a new impetus, a kind of transfiguration, or rather an awakening of a side of his nature which had hitherto slept unconscious, or disturbed only by uneasy dreams. He himself always attributed this awakening to a friendship with the "E. W. R." to whom he dedicated the first book he wrote as "Fiona Macleod," and in letters of a year or two later he wrote, very simply, "to her I owe my development as 'Fiona Macleod,' though, in a sense, of course, that began long before I knew her, and indeed while I was a child"; and again, "without her there would never have been any 'Fiona Macleod.'" He may have been right; a deep sympathy with thoughts and emotions hitherto suppressed may have called them into a waking life they would not otherwise have known. It was not a case of collaboration. William Sharp wrote every line of the Fiona books himself, and the ideas were entirely his own. It was, as we said, an impetus applied to a motionless rock, a fertilising of unquickened powers, an awakening of a slumbering spirit, and after such awakening any human being has a perfect right to name himself anew. That part of him was, in fact, almost as new as a christened child; and, besides, what would publishers and editors have thought if they had found their steady-going contributor wafted away into poetic imaginings and Celtic moonshine? Would they not have felt the same distrustful apprehension as a banker who finds a clerk promoting an aeroplane company, or a country rector who finds a curate preaching Tolstoy? A mountain rainbow is all very well in its place, but it is an undependable sort of thing, and does not shine its best on Ludgate Hill.

So, for the sake of both sides of his double self, the man was obliged to maintain the pseudonym. If the secret had been found out, he said, "Fiona" would have died; and it is very probable that William Sharp would have died too. But, of course, there were deeper reasons than either the sensible fear of hunger or the shy fear of lost inspiration. Fiona was really and literally a different person from William Sharp. He could deny their identity with entire truth. Everyone who has observed life is aware how many diverse spirits are combined in one apparent personality, and the writer in question was only a strongly marked example of a truth we are all conscious of. Each of us is usually "three people in one," and very often more than three. The same man is, at intervals, a coward and brave, a liar and truthful, passionate and cold, transfused with light and ditch-water in dulness. We hardly want examples outside our own experience, hardly outside ourselves; but let us turn to Goethe again. On one side, as we know, he was the Privy Councillor, the man of affairs, the practical administrator of a little State; on another, he was the man of science, the investigator of nature's open secret, much occupied with bones and leaves and prisms; on a third, he was the literary and artistic critic, precise in definition. And somewhere among these different selves lurked the fine and passionate spirit that sang as the lark sings and drew all the world to listen. Even in the outward man these distinctions were felt; for his friend and secretary writes:—

"At times Goethe would be silent and short, as though a cloud lay upon his soul. There were days when he seemed to be filled with icy coldness, as when a keen wind sweeps over plains of frost and snow. And next time he would be like a smiling spring morning, when the cuckoo's note is heard, and brooks run tinkling down between the meadows."

In the same way, any reader can distinguish what Germans call his Privy-Councillor manner, his scientific manner, and the utterance of the poetic spirit, nor could the three be more separate if we chose three different names for the man; just as, if the Baconians were right, we might still continue to call part of Bacon's work by Shakespeare's name, and no harm done.

Or, to take a parallel instance nearer to ourselves: a few years ago there was living in Christ Church a clerical don who, without being a greater mathematician than became Oxford, was expert in teaching even the hunting-men the cost of papering a room, leaving intervals for windows and doors, with sufficient accuracy to enable them to scrape through Smalls. Precise and old-fashioned in attire, he was precise and rather starchy in manner also. He observed the regulations of donnish life with minute correctness, and was regarded by parents as just the right type of the tutor to whom they could with equanimity entrust the conscientious direction of wayward youth. Little did they think that this model of academic precision was the man who had written,

"Speak roughly to the little boy,
And beat him when he sneezes."

Yet the Reverend Charles Dodgson, Senior Student of the House, really contained within the same skin and bones that entirely different man known to all the world as Lewis Carroll.

If it is objected that such people as he, are, at all events, two men in one, while the author of the Fiona books pretended to be a man and a woman both, we can remember Swinburne's assertion that all poets are bisexual. He made it about Tennyson's "Rizpah"—using the line where the mother, gathering her son's bones under the gallows, tells how they moved in her side; and our poets of to-day might observe that he did not mean that the poet had neither sex, but both. Or, if we may shift our ground a little and return to a simpler form of double personality, there are Browning's well-known verses at the end of his "Men and Women," telling how Raphael made a century of sonnets, and Dante once prepared to paint an angel, because, as the poet says:—

"God be thanked, the meanest of His creatures Boasts two soul-sides, one to face the world with,
One to show a woman when he loves her."

Well, during the last twelve years of his life, William Sharp at intervals showed that other side of his soul also to the world at large, but, deliberately and rightly, from the vantage ground of concealment and under a feminine name. So only it was possible for the journalistic critic, the biographer, and rather cynical novelist, to bestow on us glimpses of that Celtic vision which hangs, not only over Hebridean seas, but as a rainbow in the heart. For in that vision dwells the spirit of Dana—the tender voice calling "Away"—of whom "A. E.," himself a twofold soul, has written:—

"And I weave
My spells at evening, folding with dim caress,
Aerial arms and twilight dropping hair,
The lonely wanderer by wood or shore,
Till, filled with some deep tenderness he yields,
Feeling in dreams for the dear mother heart
He knew, ere he forsook the starry way."

Swinburne's claim to a bi-sexual nature in poets, Browning's insistence on the two soul-sides of the meanest creature, William Sharp's double personality, of which one-half was so sluggish to awaken till the right voice called—what are they but evidences of the everlasting protest of man against the limitations that hunger, family, habits, reputation, time, and space combine to press upon him? The soul is conscious of infinite capacity, if not of infinite duration, and, to put the thing on its lowest terms, breathes there a man with soul so dead who has never said to himself that he could direct the affairs of the State incomparably better than the Cabinet does?

CLIMATE ON THE STAGE.

THE Sicilians are back again in town, and once more the South invades our latitudes with the Spring. One listens to their revelation, amazed only that gesture and tone can mock geography with a magic so resistless. A man can bring a climate with him by a turn of his wrist, and bridge the seas by his strides. How trivial and mechanical seems the art of the stage craftsman when one brings it to this test. The scent of the orange groves made the theatre fragrant. The bare purple hills rose up in their volcanic majesty above the waters of Charybdis. There was a background of Norman churches and Greek ruins. The sky was a pitiless blue, and the cactus itself gasped for water to the lizard in its shade. Carabinieri lounged in the black shadows of the wine-shop, and the pomp of the Host went through the narrow streets. Beyond the walls one could hear the chorus of the peasant girls at the wine-press, and across the waters came the faint music of the fisher's song. And all of this was sheer illusion. Close your ears and gaze through the blinkers of common sense upon the boards of the stage. There is nothing of all this there. A big bare room, a few oaken chairs, a table, a cupboard, and walls of yellow plaster—these are the orange groves, the Norman churches, the Greek ruins, the brazen sky, the cactus, and the wine-press. It might have been a room in an Irish or a German farm-house. It was the voices, the gestures, the passions of the actors that made the South. An English manager would have supplied the omissions. He would have daubed his stage with local color, with obsolete costumes, with dazzling scenery, with all the apparatus of the unusual and the picturesque. In the end, he would have succeeded only in creating a scene more northern than Piccadilly, more Britannic than the Bank. The more nearly he reproduced the externals of a Sicilian landscape, the more completely would he have satisfied the Protestant conscience, and expressed the temperament of the climate where man survives only by taking thought of the morrow.

To insist on the intensity and the passion of this Sicilian acting, is to tell only half the truth about it. There are Northern actors who reach, in moments of climax, an expression of emotion hardly less concentrated and vehement. There are no strange notes in the Sicilian voice. Its cries, its sobs, its shouts of rage, analyse them one by one, and they are human rather than Southern. For mere vehemence, if that were admirable, there are tenth-rate performers in English melodrama who might, by sheer physical effort, vie with them and outclass them. One begins to understand their rare appeal when one realises that they have no organs of expression. Their whole physique is such an organ. Other actors can control the voice and make of the face a mobile mask. With them the feet are as dramatic as the hands. They move as in a dance. They act with their shoulders; they act with their knees. The very lines of their sombre, commonplace clothing seem to drape themselves into a rendering of passion. And in all this there is nothing calculated or intended. It is because the whole body has learned in a climate of abandonment and unreserve to make itself a vehicle of the life within, that its gestures and motions seem on the stage to be so wholly natural and convincing. The Northern actor works with a dim pastel medium. He mixes all his colors with white. He renders his emotional landscapes through an atmospheric haze. On pain of deviating from realism, at the risk of straying into melodrama, he can rarely express, save in the crisis of strain and self-forgetfulness, an entirely direct emotion. A fog of reserve hangs about every tone. A habit of self-restraint and self-criticism hampers every gesture. His characters, even the most simple and ingenuous, are self-conscious beings, who at every step are aware of themselves and aware of their fellows. Their social existence is founded on a rule of concealment. The revelation is the exception, the expression of emotion comes only as a climax. In this orchestra the strings are always muted, until circumstance clears the artifice away and dictates the audacious fortissimo. The art of the Northern stage is a thing of hints and suggestions. It creates its effects by contrast to this accepted reserve which its characters wear like a suit of mail. Its passions force their way painfully through a crust. Its declarations rend a curtain of silence. One hears the tearing of the curtain as the cry breaks through it; one sees the lifting of the mute as the strings vibrate at last with full and unimpeded tones. In this Sicilian acting there are none of these conventions and restraints to overcome. There is no background of silence; there is no habit of reserve. The voice which rings so sonorous in a moment of passion has never veiled itself in daily life.

The play in this Sicilian theatre is emphatically not "the thing." It is only a native dance tune which enables the actors to go through their steps. "Omerta" turns on the release of Saru, a simple Sicilian artisan, after serving a term of fifteen years' imprisonment for a murder done by another, a certain Don Toto. He returns to find Toto the master of his mortgaged home, and the husband of the girl he loved. The island code of honor forbids him to divulge the truth that Toto was the guilty man. But in a tense scene he brings him to an avowal, only to fall shortly afterwards by the murderer's revolver, leaving to his boy brother the duty of revenge "so soon as he shall be eighteen." It is a simple framework for a village tragedy, unpretending in its thinking and its structure. Direct emotions do not make for subtle psychology or for interesting complications. But from the first entry of Cavaliere Grasso among the peasant actors, the bare scene becomes a whirlpool of vitality. It is an event, it is a great experience, to see him fling his arms about the slight form of his white-haired mother. How pale seem our northern suggestions, how ghostly our northern emotions beside this volcano of tenderness and passion! It is a revelation which makes us seem absent-minded in our most exalted moments. Those knees which abandon themselves to the descent, those hands which caress the old head with a motion so large and so generous, the robust, vigorous body which somehow renders the man through the clothes, those cries almost animal in their simplicity and their terrible intensity—how they concentrated the suffering and the longing of the fifteen years of an unmerited prison, "counted minute by minute"! The amazing performance, so exotic yet so natural, ran its course. It never seemed foreign, and that was its triumph. Its effect on the English spectator was rather to make him seem a foreigner to himself. These were the natural gestures; these were the primitive tones. So, one thought, should we have spoken, if a harsh climate had not frozen our blood, benumbed our tongues, and paralysed our limbs. It was like a return from dream to waking. The mist of reserve and self-consciousness fell away. The clothes of convention were stripped from the mind as it listened, until it could believe that this was its unsophisticated shape which talked a Sicilian patois in a strange, yet so natural, environment. Even more astonishing was the scene in which Grasso at last convinced his doubting mother of his innocence. He did not argue. He swore. He knelt on the ground. He asserted. He daubed a cross on a stone with his paint-brush, as though the action were the most instinctive of gestures. He heaped upon her a whole dazzling rainbow of flowers. So swift, so volcanic was the pantomime that we could not describe it; we could barely see it. One disentangled here and there a familiar word in the patois. One followed with dazzled eyes the rapid movements of the great supple body. One heard with awe the whirlwind of passion which swept away the doubts of years. How it happened one hardly knew, but one realised that in that heat no scepticism could survive. A temperature was reached at which no lie could live. That was "the nature and meaning" of the oath. Its words passed over unheeded. One thought not at all of the vengeance of God, or of the penalty for perjury. We only saw a man in a white heat, and instinctively we knew that no guilty conscience could heap the fuel of that furnace.

Grasso was the pervading presence of the play. One felt his presence even when he was off the stage. He dwarfed his fellows when he was on it. Yet, as an artistic performance Signor Viscuso's acting of Don Toto was a supremely masterly achievement. Conceive for a moment that you have been cast for this astonishing rôle. You are a man who has committed a murder, and allowed another to endure for it fifteen years of prison, while you enjoyed his house and possessed the woman he had loved. What experience, what tradition would enable you to play the part? You might try to render it plausible by a sinister deliberation, a calculating villainy, a cold and self-contained egoism. Signor Viscuso made his Don Toto possible by the simple process of making him a very vital, but a very ordinary, Sicilian. One realised his natural gusto in the good things of life. The whole man appeared in his eating of a salad, noisily, greedily, with speechless concentration. He was flamboyant in his clothes, expansive in his affection, confident and masterful in his security. One understood the type. For him the salad, and the house, the wife, and his respectable liberty, were the realities and the only realities of life. He was unscrupulous simply because these plain good things were all he wanted. He was, in his own way, as natural an expression of the Sicilian absence of self-criticism and self-consciousness as the more social passions which Grasso rendered. The acting which created him was a revelation to the more complicated Northern mind. Our villains are a Southern tradition to which we have lost the key. Shakespeare pillaged Italian stories, and forgot to steal the psychology with the plot. It is the Southern joy of life, its relish of the obvious external good things of life, which makes the Southern villain possible, human, and tolerable.

One turns away from these plays with a certain envy—the envy with which one watches the gambols of a kitten or the games of a child. "Counted minute by minute," the phrase, banal and natural as it was, gave the whole atmosphere of Sicily. Where else does the human mind count on that scale? Our clocks reckon also the hours. To live minute by minute, to see nothing before and nothing behind, to be all in the present, to be whole at each vital throbbing of the pulse—that is the formula of this entire, this passionate life. To see these plays is to take one's seat in a time-machine more miraculous than that of Mr. Wells. It annihilates the past, it extirpates the future. It makes the moment the intense, the sole, reality.

A CITY OF SUNSHINE.

WE have never seen it except in sunshine; and it is as a sunlit city that it remains in memory. The very walls and old crumbling churches seem as if compounded of dust and sunshine, brown dust with a kind of rosy glow, as if centuries of sunlight had somehow become imprisoned there, and transfigured and glorified the crumbling clay. This, and the yellow gold in the air, like golden rain falling, gives, especially in the late afternoon, an impression of richness and delicacy. Assisi might seem to lie as the ruin of some golden city—the El Dorado of men's dreams. Behind, rises a high, brown hill, purple at sunset. The roofs and walls and church towers stretch upward to an old brown castle. Before it, white winding lanes lead down into the huge plain of Umbria, a vast sea of green, now in springtime; with the young corn growing so quickly in a night, and new shoots upon the vines. To-day, even in this early March weather, the sun shines down from an unclouded sky: calling out the riches of the earth, in preparation for another harvest. And at night, never clouded with the opaque darkness of less kindly Northern lands, there is manifest a kind of physical sense of great distance, of a land whose boundaries are situate far away. Small cities smoulder and burn as the fireflies at one's feet: with a long record of achievement behind them, and names that are like a song.

And if the first impression is of sunshine, the second is of repose. The repose is of a city that is not dead, but sleepeth. Some of these small passionate hill towns—Perugia, for example, or Siena, over there westward in Tuscany—find themselves animated by a new material prosperity: have awoken and stand upright, with the resurrection of Italy. Others—Spello, Spoleto, San Gimignano—stand to-day as museums or ancient monuments, beautiful in decay, with arch and stone and tower telling of once violent life, all as dead as the temples of Karnak or the tombs of Thebes. Assisi is as quiet as any of them. The streets which wind white between brown walls studded with adventurous plants lodged in their crevices, the great grass-grown space beneath the shadow of the castle, the walled gardens over whose boundaries trail dog-roses and hawthorn and sweet-scented plants, the frequent brown, deserted churches—all these belong to the evidence of the vanishing of that hot, sensitive life which once surged through those historic ways. A barefoot child singing in the sunshine, the passing of occasional veiled figures, white oxen returning from their labor, strike the silence suddenly in a city where the gardens have invaded the ancient boundaries and the work of the peasant occupies the heart of the town. Yet none but the incurious can fail to be conscious of a kind of Life, brooding; the presence, in an air charged with great memories, of a sleep which will one day be awakened.

We doubt if that awakening will come from wealth or trade, or even through the enlargement of those still modest hotels which house the ever-increasing horde of cosmopolitan visitors. Nor have we much hope here of the activity of those "Socialists," "Christian" or "Democratic," whose placards, shouting for action, incongruously bedaub the walls of so many deserted streets. Yet the city has something in it of the power of survival, some abiding secret—and that of the soul—to which man may one day listen, after the fever of progress has spent its forces. "Blessed be thou of the Lord, O City, faithful to God"—so Francis had blest it at the last, "because through thee many souls shall be saved. The servants of the Most High shall dwell within thy walls, and many of thy children shall be chosen for the kingdom of heaven."

How many souls are saved of the multitudes of visitors which from time to time throng its streets is a matter of conjecture. The sleeping city is a guardian of artistic treasure, as well as a memorial of the dead. The pictures and the story lure out an increasing crowd in this spring weather from the great hotels of Florence. They gaze with crooked necks and in some bodily discomfort at the smoky Giotto Frescoes on the roof of the lower Church, emerging, blinking in the sunshine, to purchase photographs of the marriage of Francis and Poverty. They glance hastily at the dead face of St. Clare at Santa Chiara, wondering that the body should be preserved so well for so many centuries. They discuss the latest, rather tedious, jargon of the day—"St. Francis and the twentieth century," "The message of St. Francis to America," "St. Francis as an advocate of the True, the Beautiful, and the Good"—all the windy rhetoric which exhibits Francis as a kindly suburban moralist who wished children and animals to be happy. They gain, we think, some satisfaction—not entirely evanescent—from the majesty of those silent, defiant churches, from the magnificence of an Umbrian springtime. And some of them learn here that the twentieth century is not the thirteenth, made respectable, frock-coated, and rational, but is moved by other impulses, towards altogether divergent ends.

And in high summer when the tourists have been deflected into Switzerland or the Italian lakes, another crowd climbs these steep, winding streets as the peasant world pays its annual tribute to the shrine of the poor man's friend. And here is all color, exuberance, emotion, with the madness which to some appears as inspiration, to others as an hysteria: men and women kissing the walls of the Portiuncula, slithering flat on their faces up the floor of the great Degli Angeli Church, licking the ground, tearing themselves to pieces in expiation of their sins. They, too, perhaps are begging, rather than praying, often with strong crying and tears and passionate, outstretched hands; for the giving of a child, or the cure of love, or the averting of the consequences of past sins. They will return tranquil to all the fields of Italy, with memories of the little brown town and the great church in the valley below; with prayers, for the most part, not unsatisfied.

He loved the sunlight; and, blind and self-tortured, composed his hymn to the Sun. Near the hut under the oak trees where now stands that huge Renaissance Church, he asked his brethren to grow not only food but flowers; "not only to cultivate vegetables, but to leave a little portion for those plants which in due time would bring forth brother flowers, for the love of Him who is called flower of the field and lily of the valley." He cast out and utterly destroyed the devils which lurked in the clefts of the hills or wandered in winter round the habitations of men. Rejoicing in renunciation of all, he could inspire his followers with that jocund spirit which laughs while it inspires, and welcoming all tribulation finds no need of forgiveness. A great happiness—distilled from that sunshine—speaks from every line of those early Franciscan records. In abandonment of all that life demands, these men found themselves "clothed with the heavens and crowned with the stars."

Up in the Carceri, in the great rift stabbed through the rock of Subasio, Francis in the summer night left his cell to essay competition with the birds, in songs to the praise of God; was forced to confess, at break of day, the victory of Brother Nightingale. And in this mountain solitude his memory remains to-day most fragrant and visible. The road to it winds upward through cornfields and olives, a track along the slopes of the Apennines, until, behind, Assisi appears as a kind of dream city, the little hill town which is the established centre of all the romance of childhood. Below stretches all Umbria; sweet-scented flowers, butterflies flitting from them, violets and yellow orchids, accompany the traveller in his path above that glittering plain. Suddenly the road turns swiftly into the heart of the hills. In the midst of a deep wood, with a gigantic ravine spanned by a single arch of crumbling stone, there nestles the tiniest of all model convents which mortal man has seen. It is like the house, suddenly discovered, of the Little Men of the forest; a little dining-room where one can just stand upright; a little kitchen, with blackened open fire; tiny bedrooms, approached by ladders; caves beneath, where once St. Francis lay; the whole giving an impression of simplicity and of age. It is the kind of house which children delight in, the house which grown-up children might build; with the sheer mountain above them, topped by a tiny slit of sky; the arch of the friendly trees peeping in at their windows; and of the outer world nothing but a narrow glimpse of a vast plain, seen as from a window cut in the rock, now swept by rain and oppressed with the cold, now all golden under the benignant sun.

You must come with acceptance, not with criticism; and acceptance is the best lesson you can carry away from it all. You must not complain, with whole generations, that Elias, amid the indignation of the older order, raised in memory of the "little poor man of Assisi" the most wonderful Church of Christendom. You must not complain that the Portiuncula, instead of being (as you would desire it) still solitary amid its oak trees, is now enclosed in a garish, unbeautiful church, and bedaubed with frescoes of no artistic value. You must not complain of the tourists who rapidly elbow you aside, or the pilgrims who gaze at you with anger as an unbeliever. You must not even complain of the chatter and gush which has accompanied recent revived interest in the Franciscan legend. For here are sunshine and repose; heroic memories, present unfading beauty; a challenge, an acceptance, a regret.

Present-Day Problems.

"GENTLES, LET US REST!"*

(A PAPER ON THE POSITION OF WOMEN.)

A MAN asked to define the essential characteristics of a gentleman—using the term in its widest sense—would presumably reply: The will to put himself in the place of others; the horror of forcing others into positions from which he himself would recoil; the power to do what seems to him right without considering what others may say or think.

There is need just now of aid from these principles of gentility in a question of some importance—the future position of women.

The ground facts of difference between the sexes, no one is likely to deny:

Women are not, and in human probability never will be, physically, as strong as men.

Men are not, nor ever will be, mothers.

Women are not, and never should be, warriors.

To these ground facts of difference are commonly added in argument, many others of more debatable character. But it is beside the purpose of this paper to enquire whether women have as much political sense or aptitude as men, whether a woman has ever produced a masterpiece of music, whether the brain of a woman ever weighed as much as the brain of Cuvier or Turgenev.

This paper designs to set forth one cardinal and overmastering consideration, in comparison with which all the other considerations affecting the question seem to this writer but as the little stars to the full moon.

In the lives of all nations there come moments when an idea, hitherto vaguely, almost unconsciously, held, assumes sculptured shape, and is manifestly felt to be of vital significance to a large, important, and steadily increasing section of the community. At such moments a spectre has begun to haunt the national house—a ghost which cannot be laid till it has received quietus.

Such a ghost now infests our home.

The full emancipation of women is an idea long vaguely held, but only in the last half-century formulated and pressed forward with real force and conviction, not only by women but by men. Of this full emancipation of women, the political vote is assuredly not, as is rather commonly supposed in a land of party politics, the be-all and end-all; it is a symbol, whose practical importance—though considerable—is as nothing beside the fulfilment of the idea which it symbolises.

For, the full emancipation of women is surely at this moment the prime demand that Equity is making of us; and the fulfilment of divine demand carries with it such subtle and warm benefit to the national heart as makes pale all mere political privilege. Above all the clamor of this suit, the serene advocacy of Equity can always be heard by whomsoever is disposed to listen.

No man can go apart, out of reach of talk, quietly to watch the sky, and contemplate all that happens thereunder, without the certainty coming to him of the existence of a Supreme Principle, overlordship what is known as Nature.

Many good words, and much good breath, are spent in turn on the explication of the Will to Power, and the Will to Love, as the animating principles of the Universe; but these are, rather, correlative half-truths, whose rivalry is surely stilled and reconciled in a yet higher principle, the Will to Harmony, to Balance, to Equity—a supreme adjustment, or harmonising power, present wherever a man turns; by which, in fact, he is conditioned, for he can no more conceive with his mental apparatus, of a Universe, without a Will to Balance holding it together, than he can conceive the opposite of the axiom, "Ex nihilo nihil fit." There is assuredly no thought so staggering as that, if a blade of grass or the energy contained within a single emotion were—not transmuted—but withdrawn from the Universe, that Universe would crumble in our imaginations to thin air.

Now social and political justice emanates slowly, with infinite labor, from our dim consciousness of this serene and overlordship principle. There would seem, for example, no fundamental reason why limits should ever have been put to autocracy, the open ballot destroyed, slavery abolished, save that these things came to be regarded as inequitable. In all such cases, before reaching the point of action, the Society of the day puts forward practical reasons, being, so to speak, unaware of its own sense of divinity. But, underneath all the seeming matter-of-factness of political and social movements, the spirit of Equity is guiding those movements, subtly, unconsciously, a compelling hand quietly pushing humanity onward, ever unseen save in the rare minutes when the spirits of men glow and light up, and things are beheld for a moment as they are. The history of a nation's spiritual development is but the tale of its wistful groping towards the provision of a machinery of State, which shall, as nearly as may be, accord with the demand of this spirit of Equity. Society, worthy of the name, is ever secretly shaping around it a temple, within which all the natural weaknesses and limitations of the dwellers shall be, not exploited and emphasised, but to the utmost levelled away and minimised. It is ever secretly providing for itself a roof under which there shall be the fullest and fairest play for all human energies, however unequal.

The destinies of mankind are seen to be guided, very slowly, by something more coherent than political opportunity; shaped steadily in a given direction, towards the completion of that temple of justice. There is no other way of explaining the growth of man from the cave-dweller to his present case. And this slow spiritual shaping proceeds alongside and in spite of the workings of the twin bodily agents, force and expediency. Social and political growth is, in fact, a process of evolution, controlled, directed, spiritualised by the supreme principle of Equity.

This is to state no crazy creed, that because equality is mathematically admirable, equality should at all times and in all places forthwith obtain. Equality, balance, is a dream, the greatest of all visions, the beloved star—ever to be worshipped, never quite reached. And the long road towards it travels the illimitable land of compromise. It would have been futile, as it was in fact impossible, to liberate slaves, when the consciousness of the injustice of slavery was present only in a few abnormal minds, and incommunicable by them to the mind of the surrounding society of the time. The process is slow and steady. Equity well knows that there is a time for Her, as for all other things. She is like the brain, saying to the limbs and senses: You are full of queer ways. It is for me to think out gradually the best rule of life, under which you must get on as you can, the Devil taking the hindmost; but from trying to devise this scheme of perfection I may not, nor ever shall, rest.

Social and political justice, then, advances by fits and starts, through ideas—children of the one great idea of Harmony—which are suggested now by one, now by another, section or phase of national life. The business is like the construction and shaping of a work of art. For an artist is ever receiving vague impressions from people unconsciously observed, from feelings unconsciously experienced, till in good time he discovers that he has an idea. This idea is but a generalisation or harmonious conception derived subconsciously from these vague impressions. Being moved to embody that idea, he at once begins groping back to, and gathering in, those very types and experiences from which he derived this general notion, in order adequately to shape the vehicle—his picture, his poem, his novel—which shall carry his idea forth to the world.

So in social and political progress. The exigencies and inequalities of existing social life produce a crop of impressions on certain receptive minds, which suddenly burst into flower in the form of ideas. The minds in which these abstractions or ideas have flowered, seek then to burgeon them forth, and their method of doing so is to bring to public notice those exigencies and inequalities which were the original fuel of their ideas. In this way is the seed of an idea spread amongst a community. But wherever the seed of an idea falls, it has to struggle up through layers of prejudice, to overcome the rule of force and expediency; and if this idea, this generalisation from social exigencies or inequalities, be false, retrograde, or distorted, it withers and dies during the struggle. If, on the other hand, it be true, consonant with the future, and of fair promise, it holds fast and spreads.

Now, one may very justly say that this is all a platitudinal explanation of the crude process of social and political development, and that in taking a given idea such as the full emancipation of women, the fight only begins to rage round the question whether that idea is in fact holding fast and spreading, and, if holding fast and spreading, whether the community is, or is not yet, sufficiently permeated with the idea to be safely entrusted with its fulfilment. The fact has, nevertheless, to be borne in mind, that, if this idea can be proved to be holding fast and spreading, it must be an idea emanating from the root divinity in things, from the overmastering principle of Equity, and sure of ultimate fulfilment; and, the only question will then be, exactly how long the rule of expediency and force may advisably postpone its fulfilment.

Now, in order to discover whether the idea of the full emancipation of women is in accord with the great principle of Equity, it will be necessary, first, to show the present inferiority of woman's political and social position; then, to consider the essential reason of that inferiority; and, thirdly, to see whether the facts and figures of the movement towards the removal of that inferiority, clearly prove that the idea has long been holding fast and spreading.

To show, however, that the present political and social position of women is not equal to that of men, it will surely suffice to state two admitted facts: Women have not the political vote. Women, who can be divorced for one offence, must, before they obtain divorce, prove two kinds of offence against their husbands.

And to ascertain the essential reason of this present inferiority, we need hardly go beyond the ground facts of difference between men and women already mentioned:—

Women are not physically as strong as men.

Men are never mothers.

Women are not warriors.

From these ground facts readily admitted by all, the reason for the present inferiority of women's position emerges clear and unmistakable: Women are weaker than men. They are weaker because they are not so physically strong; they are weaker because they have to bear and to rear children; they are weaker because they are unarmed. There is no getting away from it, they are weaker; and one cannot doubt for a moment that their inferior position is due to this weakness. But—so runs an immemorial argument—however equal their opportunities might be, women will never be as strong as men. Why then, for sentimental reasons, disturb the present order of things, why equalise those opportunities? This is the plea which was used before married women were allowed separate property, before the decision in Regina versus Jackson, which forbade a husband to lock his wife up. The argument, in fact, of expediency and force.

Now there are no finer statements of the case for the full emancipation of women than Mill's "Subjection of Women," and a pamphlet entitled: "Homo Sum; being a letter from an Anthropologist to an Anti-Suffragist." The reasonings in the former work are too well-known, but to the main thesis of "Homo Sum" allusion must here be made. The most common, perhaps most telling, plea against raising the social and political status of women to a level with that of men, is this: Men and women are already equal, but in separate spheres of activity. The difference between their physical conformation and functions underlies everything in the lives of both. The province and supremacy of women are in the home; the province and supremacy of men in the State. Why seek to alter what Nature has ordained? A plea, in fact, which glorifies sex quâ sex.

But the writer of "Homo Sum" is at pains to show that "the splendid and vital instinct of sex" with all its "singular power of interpenetrating and reinforcing other energies" is in essence egotistic, exclusive, anti-social; and that, besides and beyond being men and women, we are all human beings. "The whole woman's movement," the writer says, "is just the learning of that lesson. It is not an attempt to arrogate man's prerogative of manhood; it is not even an attempt to assert and emphasize woman's privilege of womanhood; it is simply the demand that in the life of woman, as in the life of man, space and liberty shall be found for a thing bigger than either manhood or womanhood—for humanity."

The splendid instinct of sex—for all its universality, for all that through and by it life is perpetuated, for all its power of bringing delight, and of revealing the heights and depths of human emotion—is still in its essence an agent of the rule of force, for we cannot but perceive that there is in both men and women something more exalted and impersonal, akin to the supreme principle of Equity, to the divinity in things; and that this something keeps men and women together as strongly, as inevitably, as sex keeps them apart. What is all the effort of civilisation but the gradual fortifying of that higher part of us, the exaltation of the principle of justice; the chaining of the principle of force? The full emancipation of women would be but a symbol of this effort of civilisation; a reassuring sign that this nation was still serving humanity, still trying to be gentle and just. For if it has ceased to serve humanity, we must surely pray that the waters may rise over this island, and that she may go down all standing!

THE FRENCH ADMINISTRATIVE SCANDALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The debate in the Chamber on the liquidation scandals ended last night in a vote of confidence in the Government carried by an overwhelming majority against a minority composed of forty-one Socialists, fourteen Radicals, one deputy of the Centre, and twenty-three deputies of the Right. There were 116 abstentions, composed of nearly all the Centre, thirty-nine deputies of the Right, eleven Socialists, seventeen of the other groups of the Left, and the Abbé Lemire, who belongs to no group. On Monday night old Parliamentary hands considered that things looked bad for the Government. M. Barthou's speech, with its startling admissions, unaccompanied by any satisfactory guarantees for the future, had created a feeling of discomfort which might well have wreaked itself on the Government, had not the latter hurriedly adjourned the debate. As has so often happened, a night's reflection and M. Briand's persuasive eloquence changed the situation.

It would be hard for a reader of M. Briand's speech to understand its effect. He declared, of course, that the Government had done all its duty, and would continue to do it; but so did M. Barthou; and M. Briand was not much more explicit as to details. But it is necessary to hear M. Briand to understand his influence on the Chamber; it is not so much what he says as the way in which he says it. Moreover, a change of Government on the eve of the General Election is not a prospect that appeals to the average deputy, and the Conservatives of the Left knew that the alternative to the Briand Cabinet was a Cabinet headed or influenced by M. Combes. As M. Combes is the person mainly responsible for the exposure of the liquidators, the President of the Republic could hardly have sent for anyone else. A Combes Cabinet, or a Cabinet formed on M. Combes' advice, would mean an alliance with the Socialists, and Socialism is what the Conservatives of the Left dread more than anything else. The cynic cannot but chuckle at the fate which makes them look to the former apostle of the general strike to save them from the Social Revolution.

It cannot be said that the debate has revived the tarnished prestige of the Radical Party. The speaker who best represented public opinion was M. Jaurès; he rose, as he always does on these occasions, above personalities and party jealousies and lobby intrigues, and put the matter clearly and directly. He was not answered. We do not yet know why, although the Senatorial Commission, of which M. Combes is Chairman, drew the attention of the Government a year ago to the irregularities of M. Lecouturier, that gentleman still holds his position as a liquidator. We do not yet know why M. Lemarquis, who was lost in admiration of M. Duez's methods of book-keeping, is still unrevoked. We do not yet know why M. Duez himself continued so long to practise with impunity that ingenuity in cooking accounts which provoked M. Lemarquis' admiration.

We do know that M. Lecouturier is the brother-in-law of M. Bunau-Varilla, proprietor of the "Matin," a paper which has supported M. Clemenceau and M. Briand as consistently as it opposed M. Combes. We also know that M. Millerand, now Minister of Public Works, maintained excellent relations with M. Lecouturier, which brought him and his clerks (the proportion allotted to the clerks is not stated) £3,208 in legal fees; that M. Millerand also contributed a preface to a work of M. Duez on the practical application of the Law of 1901 as it applied to the Congregations, a work which might have been, but apparently was not, extremely entertaining. We know a good many other things of this kind which, although they certainly do not prove any guilty complicity, require explanation. A young Socialist-Radical deputy, M. Binet, had the courage to raise the question of M. Millerand's relations with the liquidators. The members of the Government retired to consider the matter (a somewhat strange proceeding), and, when they returned, M. Briand, being challenged by M. Jaurès, declared that M. Millerand was his friend whom he would never desert, and M. Millerand, on being further pressed by M. Binet, said that he disdained the latter's insults. All of which is touching and dignified, but leaves us where we were. It must at least be admitted that M. Binet had some justification for his view that an ex-Minister who has every prospect of holding office again would be wise to abstain from acting as an advocate in matters arising out of laws that he has helped to make.

M. Binet's courage was not shared by most of his colleagues; the French Radical Party is not just now in a robust condition. M. Binet spoke the truth when he said that he expressed the opinions of many other Radicals; it is quite certain that the explanations of the Government are not generally regarded as satisfactory. Yet only thirteen Radicals accompanied M. Binet into the division lobby against the Government, and the same mystic number had the courage to abstain. It is not the fact that the Government remains in office that will discredit the Radical Party in the country, but the fact that the vote of last night did not express the convictions of the voters. The record of the majority in the expiring Parliament is already far from brilliant. The Senate, in which there is, after all, a Radical majority, has hung up the income-tax, mutilated the Ballot Bill, delayed Old Age Pensions until the last moment, and reversed the decision of the Chamber to earmark the new death duties in order to provide for the pensions. Both this and the preceding Ministry are responsible for these dilatory tactics; they have never made a firm stand against the obstruction of the Senate, and the majority in the Chamber has not compelled them to do so. The "Temps" is now chuckling, perhaps with reason, over the possibility that there will not be time to carry the Pensions Bill before the elections. To sum up, the legislative record of the last four years is practically blank.

The gravity of the present scandal lies in the fact that it reveals the rottenness of a whole section of the French judicial system. M. Duez, M. Lecouturier, and M. Ménage belong to a body of quasi-officials who perform the functions performed in England by official receivers, but who are much more irresponsible and much less easily called to account. They are nominated by the Court, and are responsible to the Court, but the case of Duez shows that the control of the Court over their proceedings is extremely lax. Duez seems to have embezzled not only £200,000 or so from the sequestered property of the Congregations, but also some £40,000 from private fortunes which he had to administer. Among the functions of a judicial liquidator is that of acting as trustee for a person placed under a conseil judiciaire, a position which must afford ample opportunity for gentlemen so ingenious as M. Duez, who seems to have availed himself of it on more than one occasion. According to Duez himself, he has practised his depredations for years, and began his career by helping himself to £20,000 belonging to his former employer, M. Imbert, also a judicial liquidator; since then, as he naïvely remarked, he has always been in arrear. Not one of the least amazing circumstances in this amazing case is the indignant denial of M. Imbert that any such sum was stolen from him, to which Duez replied that, as M. Imbert knew nothing about his own books, the trifling loss escaped him. To a judicial liquidator £20,000 more or less is evidently a bagatelle.

It was on M. Imbert's strong recommendation that Duez was appointed one of the liquidators of the Congregations; the appointments of M. Lecouturier and M. Ménage were made, according to M. Barthou, on the recommendation of M. Vallé, who at that time held M. Barthou's present office of Minister of Justice. It is now plain that it would have been better to entrust the liquidation of the Congregations to the administration des domaines, that is to say, to Government officials, as M. Prache, a deputy of the Right, proposed in 1904; but the system of judicial liquidation was chosen precisely because the judicial liquidators are free from Government control and under the direct court. The result shows that M. Barthou did not go too far when he said that there is "quelque chose de gangrené dans notre organisation judiciaire."

One of the most startling circumstances in the whole affair is the way in which Duez seems to have been almost protected by the Court which ought to have called him to account. It was only after great pressure from the Government that it consented to deprive him of his functions, and only when the Senatorial Commission had dragged the scandal to light that it arrested him. A horde of lawyers battered on the endless lawsuits that the liquidations involved, and the fees paid to them have been out of all proportion to their services; judicial liquidators are known as the most generous of clients. The decision of the Grenoble Court in the case of the Grande Chartreuse is not more creditable to the legal profession. The story of the complicated three-cornered negotiations between M. Lecouturier, M. Cusenier, and M. Marnier is too long to tell here. The net result was that M. Lecouturier sold the right to make the liqueur to M. Cusenier for 500,000 francs, and that M. Marnier was condemned to pay two-and-a-half million francs for breach of contract. As M. Jaurès said last night, supposing that M. Marnier can pay the damages, the State will obtain as the purchase price 500,000 francs from the man who possesses the right, and five times as much from the man who gets nothing. The circumstances in which M. Lecouturier was (apparently) let in for selling the right to M. Cusenier, demonstrate, if not complicity, at least grave incapacity, and the facts suggest that M. Marnier was a victim.

The facts brought to the notice of the senatorial commission also suggest grave irregularities in the matter of sales by private agreement. It is asserted that many of these sales were made for ridiculous sums to men or syndicates of straw representing the Congregations, and that liquidators were recompensed for their complaisance. In other cases liquidators are accused of corrupt arrangements with descendants of benefactors of the Congregations, and, in fact, of obtaining illicit commissions and profits in various ways on the transactions entrusted to them. The evidence before the senatorial commission supports these accusations, and the best that a member of the commission could say of M. Ménage was that he was "the least dishonest of the three."

It is felt that, although the Government had no direct control over the liquidators, it cannot be absolved of all responsibility for the prolonged continuance of such practices. If the Courts refused to do their duty, Parliament could have been consulted earlier. It now remains to redress the mischief as far as possible. M. Briand proposes to pass before the elections a measure assimilating the procedure in the liquidations to those of the liquidations resulting from the Separation Law, which have been accomplished with small expense and without the slightest suspicion of malpractices. This will involve the substitution of administrative for judicial liquidators. M. Barthou has promised that appeals shall be lodged against all suspicious sales by private contract, and the Government is pledged to probe the whole matter to the roots and take the necessary measures against the guilty persons. But the country will not be satisfied unless the scandal results, as M. Barthou has promised that it shall, in a complete reform of the system of judicial liquidation.—Yours, &c.,

THE "ELEKTRA" OF STRAUSS AND HOFFMANSTAHL.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—It is our good fortune to have produced in Professor Gilbert Murray a writer and scholar able to raise the Electra of Euripides from the dead and make it a living possession for us. Thanks to him, we know the poem as if it were an English one. But nothing Professor Murray can do can ever make us feel quite as the Electra of Euripides felt about her mother's neglect to bury her father properly after murdering him. A heroine who feels that to commit murder, even husband murder, is a thing that might happen to anybody, but that to deny the victim a proper funeral is an outrage so unspeakable that it becomes her plain filial duty to murder her mother in expiation, is outside that touch of nature that makes all the ages akin: she is really too early-Victorian. To us she is more unnatural than Clytemnestra or Aegistheus; and, in the end, we pity them and secretly shrink from their slayers. What Hoffmanstahl and Strauss have done is to take Clytemnestra and Aegistheus, and by identifying them with everything that is evil and cruel, with all that needs must hate the highest when it sees it, with hideous domination and coercion of the higher by the baser, with the murderous rage in which the lust for a lifetime of orgiastic pleasure turns on its slaves in the torture of its disappointment and the sleepless horror and misery of its neurasthenia, to so rouse in us an overwhelming flood of wrath against it and ruthless resolution to destroy it, that Electra's vengeance becomes holy to us; and we come to understand how even the gentlest of us could wield the axe of Orestes or twist our firm fingers in the black hair of Clytemnestra to drag back her head and leave her throat open to the stroke.

That was a task hardly possible to an ancient Greek, and not easy even to us who are face to face with the America of the Thaw case, and the European plutocracy of which that case was only a trifling symptom. And that is the task which Hoffmanstahl and Strauss have achieved. Not even in the third scene of "Das Rheingold," or in the Klingsor scenes in "Parsifal," is there such an atmosphere of malignant and cancerous evil as we get here. And that the power with which it is done is not the power of the evil itself, but of the passion that detests and must and finally can destroy that evil, is what makes the work great, and makes us rejoice in its horror.

Whoever understands this, however vaguely, will understand Strauss's music, and why on Saturday night the crowded house burst into frenzied shoutings, not merely of applause, but of strenuous assent and affirmation, as the curtain fell. That the power of conceiving it should occur in the same individual as the technical skill and natural faculty needed to achieve its complete and overwhelming expression in music, is a stroke of the rarest good fortune that can befall a generation of men. I have often said, when asked to state the case against the fools and money changers who are trying to drive us into a war with Germany, that the case consists of the single word, Beethoven. To-day, I should say with equal confidence, Strauss. That we should make war on Strauss and the heroic warfare and aspiration that he represents is treason to humanity. In this music drama Strauss has done for us just what he has done for his own countrymen: he has said for us, with an utterly satisfying force, what all the noblest powers of life within us are clamoring to have said, in protest against and defiance of the omnipresent villainies of our civilisation; and this is the highest achievement of the highest art.

It was interesting to compare our conductor, the gallant Beecham, bringing out the points in Strauss's orchestration, until sometimes the music sounded like a concerto for six drums, with Strauss himself, bringing out the meaning and achieving the purpose of his score so that we forgot that there was an orchestra there at all, and could hear nothing but the conflict and storm of passion. Human emotion is a complex thing: there are moments when our feeling is so deep and our ecstasy so exalted that the primeval monsters from whom we are evolved wake within us and utter the strange tormented cries of their ancient struggles with the Life Force. All this is in "Elektra"; and under the bâton of Strauss the voices of these epochs are kept as distinct in their unity as the parts in a Bach motet. Such colossal counterpoint is a counterpoint of all the ages; not even Beethoven in his last great Mass comprehended so much. The feat is beyond all verbal description: it must be heard and felt; and even then, it seems, you must watch and pray, lest your God should forget you, and leave you to hear only "abominable ugliness and noise," and, on remonstrance, lead you to explain handsomely that Strauss is "vulgar, and stupid, and ugly" only "sometimes," and that this art of his is so "ridiculously easy" that nothing but your own self-respect prevents you from achieving a European reputation by condescending to practise it.

So much has been said of the triumphs of our English singers in "Elektra" that I owe it to Germany to profess my admiration of the noble beauty and power of Frau Fassbender's Elektra. Even if Strauss's work were the wretched thing poor Mr. Newman mistook it for, it would still be worth a visit to Covent Garden to see her wonderful death dance, which was the climax of one of the most perfect examples yet seen in London of how, by beautiful and eloquent gesture, movement, and bearing, a fine artist can make not only her voice, but her body, as much a part of a great music drama as any instrument in the score. The other German artists, notably Frau Bahr Mildenburg, showed great power and accomplishment; but they have received fuller acknowledgment, whereas we should not have gathered from the reports that Frau Fassbender's performance was so extraordinary as it actually was. A deaf man could have watched her with as little sense of privation as a blind man could have listened to her. To those of us who are neither deaf nor blind nor anti-Straussian critics (which is the same thing), she was a superb Elektra.

Whatever may be the merits of the article which gave rise to the present correspondence, it is beyond question that it left the readers of THE NATION without the smallest hint that the occasion was one of any special importance, or that it was at all worth their while to spend time and money in supporting Mr. Beecham's splendid enterprise, and being present on what was, in fact, a historic moment in the history of art in England, such as may not occur again within our lifetime. Many persons may have been, and possibly were, prevented by that article from seizing their opportunity, not because Mr. Newman does not happen to like Strauss's music, but because he belittled the situation by so miscalculating its importance that he did not think it worth even the effort of criticising it, and dismissed it in a notice in which nothing was studied except his deliberate contemptuous insolence to the composer. It would have been an additional insult to Strauss to have waited to hear "Elektra" before protesting, on the plainest grounds of international courtesy and artistic good faith, against such treatment of the man who shares with Rodin the enthusiastic gratitude and admiration of the European republic, one and indivisible, of those who understand the highest art. But now that I have heard "Elektra," I have a new duty to the readers of THE NATION, and that is to take upon me the work Mr. Newman should have done, and put them in possession of the facts.

And now Ernest, "Triff noch einmal"!—Yours, &c.,

THE PROVINCIAL OPERA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a subscriber to "The Ring" performance given in Edinburgh during the past two weeks, I read with deep interest your special article on this notable experiment. I think, however, the writer has failed in as much as he has adopted the superior musical student's platform instead of taking a broad and wide view. It is pure affectation to say "People who have become interested in the later Wagner, in Strauss, in Debussy, in Elgar, and in Bantock, feel no particular yearning to spend an evening over Gounod's

"Faust" or "Tannhauser" or "Lohengrin." Whatever may be the value of the later Wagner and the other composers mentioned, it nevertheless remains true that the operas mentioned are great works of art calling out the highest skill, and if the later compositions destroy a love for these, then I fear all is not right with the new school of musical thought. An opera, a book, a picture which cannot be understood by the majority of ordinary men may be a work of art, but it has failed in the chief object of its creation—to tell something to the race.

The writer also forgets Edinburgh is not a provincial town, but a capital, and has a long and honorable musical history. We have a school of music in our University, and are producing sound musicians. The Scottish Orchestra, which is as good as any orchestra in London, Paris, or Berlin, has for twenty-five years been doing great educational work. This splendid combination under the baton of a great conductor made "The Ring" a success; but how such a combination could be taken round the other large cities is not so easily understood. I believe, however, Edinburgh and Glasgow could combine in having an operatic festival every second or third year, just as at present the Scottish Orchestra serves both cities each winter. I see Mr. Denhof is being asked to repeat the success in the autumn, but I think he will be wise to pause and consider. I believe the present venture will not be a financial success, although the gallery seats were 5s. each and the pit 7s. 6d. each. Cost must be considered, and I do not think there is a public sufficiently large to support this, except occasionally. At least, in Scotland we are not wealthy enough to do it. Edinburgh and Glasgow have the material, and I hope, with your writer, that the work will not drop, but that a public-spirited body of men and women will follow up what Mr. Denhof has so well begun. I would also strongly dissent from the remarks about the Press. The chief organs gave the movement whole-hearted support, and their articles were both good and correct. I do not know which paper it was that blundered, but I can assure the writer the Scottish Press is well informed on musical matters.—Yours, &c.,

March 15th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your readers in Edinburgh will be interested by your article in this week's issue on the recent performance of Wagner's "Ring." Herr Denhof has made a courageous and auspicious beginning, and it is well that his work should receive adequate recognition—which, as a rule, the Edinburgh Press is unfortunately not well enough instructed to give. But one passage in your article is rather too strongly flavored with Metropolitan contempt. "An orchestra of eighty-two poured out a magnificent flood of tone that must have astonished the provincials, whose previous notions of an operatic orchestra had been derived from what the touring companies have given them." The orchestra in question is, of course, the Scottish Orchestra, which has served Edinburgh and Glasgow for many seasons, and, although it has never, I think, taken part in full operatic performances, has many times included in its programmes various parts of the "Ring" music: so that we "provincials" are not such uninstructed Philistines, even in the matter of opera, as THE NATION, in its superb London way, seems to think. Dr. Cowen, the conductor and trainer of the Scottish Orchestra, has brought his company to such a degree of excellence, that they can essay with success, under a new leader, so notable a task as that of the "Ring," from which they have emerged with high distinction.—Yours, &c.,

WHY SHOULD THERE BE A SECOND GENERAL ELECTION?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I support the view presented in your last issue by "An Old Liberal"? Why should it be supposed that the King will fail to place the prerogative at the disposal of Mr. Asquith, if he should be asked to do so? The working of an unwritten Constitution like our own is determined, as Lord Salisbury saw with respect to finance, by the logic of facts. Surely the essential fact about all the prerogatives of the Crown is that, so long as they are exercised by the King on the advice of his Ministers, the full responsibility attending their exercise rests on Ministers and not on the Crown, but, as soon as they are used or withheld against such advice, then the Crown is drawn into the vortex of party politics. No loyal subject should, I venture to think, suppose for a moment that the King will descend from the position of commanding dignity and wise influence (as distinguished from control) which he now occupies, and mix in party strife. Accordingly, we may assume that the prerogative will be granted, if asked for by a Ministry commanding the confidence of the House of Commons, who will, of course, bear the sole responsibility for the advice they tender, and the real question is whether the situation, as it develops, will require this advice to be given, and justify the Ministry in giving it.—Yours, &c.,

THE NEW INDIAN PRESS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is unfortunate that, on account of the storm and strain of home politics, few English readers will find time to study the speeches of the educated Indian gentlemen whom Lord Morley's reform scheme has happily brought into the Viceroy's Legislative Council. It is unfortunate, because any unprejudiced person reading the debate on the new Indian Press Act must be impressed by the goodwill and sound, practical knowledge which these counsellors, who represent the Congress party, have placed at the disposal of the Government.

Voicing unanimous Indian opinion, they warn the Government that to silence the Press is a very imperfect remedy for the popular exasperation which has led to anarchism; and they affirm unhesitatingly that the root cause of the lamentable outrages is to be found in the despair generated in youthful minds by the harsh repression which accompanied Lord Curzon's policy of reaction, culminating in the partition of Bengal. Remove this thorn from the flesh, and the wound will heal. Deal with the causes of the mischief—not merely with the symptoms. They recognise that the situation has become easier, owing to Lord Morley's reforms, and Lord Minto's sympathetic attitude; and they urge that further steps should be taken along this path of conciliation, which is the path of safety.

But holding such views, these independent members of the Council have nevertheless acquiesced (however sadly) in this fresh blow struck at the freedom of the Press. What is the reason of this? It is because they are unwilling to refuse to the authorities any weapons demanded in the name of public safety. They are determined to resist all attempts to upset the existing government, because they are convinced that the permanent welfare of India is dependent on the British connection, however mistaken or perverse any particular phase of policy may be. To quote the words of the Hon. Mr. Gokhale, the hopes of a peaceful evolution are bound up with the unquestioned continuance of British rule. Or, as expressed by the Hon. Mr. Chitnavis, "anarchism retards the fruition of the country's hopes and its progress. Self-government is attainable only under the ægis of the British Government by a process of slow and peaceful evolution." And I must add the wise and genial words of the Hon. Mr. Bhupendranáth Básu: "We want this rule to continue on an ever widening base, welding the peoples of India into a nation justly proud of its comradeship with England, possessing common rights and common privileges, and sharing in common dangers."—Yours, &c.,

THE LIBERAL PARTY AND THE WHIPS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your valuable and well-timed article, "Plucked from the Pit," in last week's issue, and the above article in your issue of the 12th inst., signed by "A Radical Member," have admirably expressed the feelings and opinions of many members of the Liberal Party at the present time. I know of an instance of a candidate who twice communicated with the Chief Whip on the political questions of the day, and to this hour has never even received a simple and polite acknowledgment of his letter. Mr. Herbert Samuel the other day rather aptly said that peoples are generally better than their Governments, and certainly the present Government is no exception to this rule. I should prefer to say, however, that a country has just such a Government as it deserves, and the recent revolt of the Liberal Party in the direction of bold and fearless action was one of the finest things that has happened for many a long day. It is no use pretending a confidence which does not exist, and if the present leaders and Whips do not realise their duties and responsibilities, they will require to make way for other and more trustworthy men. Declamation, tactics, platform oratory, and virulent class abuse are not equivalents for statesmanship. They have their place and use, but I venture to state that what the Liberal Party hungers for, and very seldom gets, is an appeal to the higher principles of moral justice and righteousness applied to home and foreign affairs, wise economy in expenditure, particularly on armaments, and practical schemes of social reform.—Yours, &c.,

THE FOREIGN OFFICE AND THE CONGO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—After two years' negotiation with the Belgian Government, during which we have asserted times without number that the Anglo-Congolese Convention of 1884 and the Berlin Act of 1885 entitle us, and lay upon us the duty, of intervening in the matter of the Congo, the Belgian Colonial Minister declares in the Senate (February 24th):—

"It does not pertain to the dignity of a free country to admit foreign intervention in our internal affairs. No official intervention! The International Acts relating to the Conventional Basin of the Congo exclude the possibility of it absolutely."

It was only last November that the Prime Minister, speaking in the Guildhall, said: "The agitation in this country with regard to Congo reform . . . has regard to a territory and a population towards which we have undertaken solemn obligations."

What a pitiable figure British diplomacy, backed by a naval expenditure of forty millions sterling, and by a popular mandate which no Foreign Secretary has ever enjoyed in any question, is cutting in this Congo matter!

The Congo is not a party question, but upon Liberals, both in Parliament and out of it, surely rests, a Liberal Government being in power, the chief opportunity and the special duty of stopping the dry-rot.

My Congo mail, received to-day, shows that everything is going on in precisely the same manner as before the Belgian Colonial Minister's visit. It could hardly be otherwise, seeing that the Congo Budget for this year provides that over 50 per cent. of the revenue shall be raised by what is euphemistically called "forced labor."

It is doubtless for this reason that the Foreign Office is renewing its old game of suppressing the reports of its Consular officials—pursued from 1896 to 1904, until the public agitation compelled a change of practice.

No report has been published from any of the Consular staff since January, 1909, and none from the Vice-Consul in the Katanga region of the Congo for over two years.

For what purpose, then, does the nation pay for the upkeep of these officials in the Congo?—Yours, &c.,

E. D. MOREL.

POLICY AND ARMAMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“The more ‘Dreadnoughts’ we build, the weaker our foreign policy becomes, so far as any moral influence is concerned.” I was exceedingly glad to read this sentence in your “Diary of the Week.”

Surely if £68,000,000 is spent on the Army and Navy, there should be something to show for it.

It used to be held that we wanted an Army and Navy to give us influence in the Councils of Europe for good; but as far as I am able to judge, England now exercises less influence on behalf of the subject races and the oppressed generally than she did in 1850.—Yours, &c.,

THE CRUSADE AGAINST CONSUMPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of March 12th Mr. Aldridge describes the scheme for the municipal improvement of Paris as the greatest yet known, and says that Paris is “the first municipality to devote a large sum of money to the definite purpose of fighting the ‘white scourge’ of consumption.”

I have no wish to question the accuracy of this statement. But I think it is worth while to call the attention of your readers to the work done in Germany.

I quote from “The German Workman,” by Mr. W. H. Dawson, published in 1906. Mr. Dawson pointed out that by that time Berlin, Dresden, Munich, Leipzig, Aix-la-Chapelle, and some other large towns had established sanatoria and isolation homes for tuberculous patients; that Coblenz, Essen, Duisburg, Mülheim, Ruhrort, and Rees levied a special district tax for the same purpose; and that Saxony, Baden, Hesse, had established, and that other parts of the empire were striving for, compulsory notification of tuberculous cases. Further, Mr. Dawson pointed out that in Berlin during the years 1897 to 1904 the Insurance Board expended no less than £1,776,600 in the remedial treatment of workpeople suffering from tuberculosis. This is not exactly a municipal effort, but I trust that those whose interest is aroused by Mr. Aldridge's letter will not fail to read the suggestive chapter on the “Anti-Consumption Crusade” in Mr. Dawson's book.

Your readers will, I hope, pardon me for calling their attention to work with which some of them may be familiar, as Mr. Dawson's later volume, “The Evolution of Modern Germany,” was in the hands of many Liberal workers at the General Election.—Yours, &c.,

FRANK E. MARSHALL.

THE FULNESS OF TIME.

ON a rusty iron throne,
Past the furthest star of space,
I saw Satan sit unknown,
Old and haggard was his face:
For his work was done, and he Rested in Eternity.

And to him from out the sun
Came his Father and his Friend, Saying, “Now the work is done, Enmity is at an end.”
And He guided Satan to Paradises that he knew.

Gabriel without a frown,
Uriel without a spear,
Raphael came winging down,
While the cherubs chanted clear,
“Now the Morning Star shall climb
Bright as in the olden time.”

WOMEN form so large a proportion, both of novel-readers and of novel-writers, that it is particularly interesting to have a study of English fiction from a distinctively feminine point of view. Miss Clara Whitmore, who undertakes this task in a book called "Woman's Work in English Fiction," just published by Messrs. Putnams, regrets that nearly all the books on literature have been written from a man's standpoint. In other arts, she holds, the tastes of men and women vary little, but the choice of novels is, to a large degree, determined by sex. There is a good deal of truth in this, though Miss Whitmore exaggerates a little when she says that "no woman can read a novel of Smollett's without loathing." Miss Rebecca Sharpe, at least, did not share this prejudice. "Once," her historian tells us, "when Mr. Crawley asked what the young people were reading, the governess replied, 'Smollett.' 'Oh, Smollett,' said Mr. Crawley, quite satisfied. 'His history is more dull, but by no means so dangerous as that of Mr. Hume.' 'Yes,' said Miss Rose; without, however, adding that it was the history of Mr. Humphrey Clinker."

* * *

So determined is Miss Whitmore to give us the true feminine point of view that, whenever her own judgment has been different from the generally accepted one, "the point in question has been submitted to other women, and not recorded unless it met with the approval of a large number of women of cultivated taste." Her book consists of an examination of the work of thirty-five women novelists who have played some part in the development of English fiction, and she claims that it is to her sex we owe the first humanitarian novel, Mrs. Aphra Behn's "Oroonoko"; the first political novel, Mrs. Manley's "New Atalantis"; the first English novel of introspection, Mrs. Sheridan's "Sidney Biddulph"; the first historical novel based upon research, Jane Porter's "The Scottish Chiefs"; the first novel of factory life, Mrs. Trollope's "The Life and Adventures of Michael Armstrong"; the first novel of the relations of capital and labor, Mrs. Gaskell's "North and South"; the first novel depicting Scottish life, Elizabeth Hamilton's "The Cottagers of Glenburnie"; and the first novel depicting Irish life, Maria Edgeworth's "Castle Rackrent."

ALTHOUGH the Empress Eugénie has emphatically denied any intention of issuing her autobiography, some compensation for its non-appearance will be supplied by a book which Messrs. Harper intend to issue shortly after Easter. This is Mr. Legge's "The Empress Eugénie, 1870-1910." It is based on first-hand information, and will contain material of importance written by Napoleon III. himself. The book gives the Empress Eugénie's statement of her own position, the Emperor's story of Sedan, the history of his exile, and the reminiscences of the Prince Imperial. So much fresh material bearing upon the last days of the Empire has been made public of late—notably by M. Ollivier—that the time has almost come when a definite history of the period can be written.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL announce a biography of the Marquise du Châtelet by Frank Hamel, a writer who has shown skill and knowledge in the treatment of French historical personages. Madame du Châtelet is only remembered to-day because of the part she played in Voltaire's life during his long residence at Cirey. But she has also claims to consideration on her own account. She is typical of the eighteenth century in France, both on its light and serious sides, and Sainte-Beuve says that her position in literature and philosophy was one which the women of her day found it easier to smile at than to dispute. She translated Newton's "Principia" into French and was a mathematician of some note in her own time. Voltaire's devotion, as well as her own fame in the world of science, brought upon her the jealousy of Madame du Deffand and Madame de Staël-Delaunay, and Sainte-Beuve declares that the portrait drawn of her by Madame du Deffand is the bitterest and most cruelly satirical passage in French literature. The brilliant though dissolute society of the Regency, among which she moved, forms the background of Frank Hamel's biography, which also introduces the Duc de Richelieu, Saint-Lambert, Hénault, and other names familiar to readers of the memoirs of the period.

MR. PADRAIC COLUM has just finished a new play called "The Magnate," which will be produced at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, next month. Mr. Colum's work is always fresh and thoroughly Irish in tone, and, since the death of J. M. Synge, he is perhaps the dramatist of most promise of the young Irish school.

* * *

UNDER the title of "The Moon of the Fourteenth Night," Messrs. Hurst & Blackett announce a book about Persia which is the joint work of M. Eustache de Lorey and Mr. Douglas Sladen. M. de Lorey has been for several years in the French Legation at Teheran, and the coming work throws fresh light upon the events which led up to the recent revolution, as well as upon Persian manners and customs.

* * *

ANOTHER book on Persia is to be issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Its title is "Persia in Revolution," and it gives an account of a journey made last spring to Persia and the Caucasus by Mr. J. M. Hone and Mr. P. L. Dickinson. The authors describe life in Teheran during the crisis, and the characters of the leading figures in the struggle are sketched. The concluding chapters treat of the homeward journey, through Baku, Tiflis, Kutais, and Batoum, and special attention is given to the Georgians, a people who once ruled in Transcaucasia and withstood the attacks of both Turks and Russians.

* * *

COLONEL HAGGARD's books dealing with the bypaths of French history are always readable, and, in choosing the rivalry of François I. of France and Charles V. of Germany for his coming volume, he has taken a subject full of dramatic interest and color. The period abounds in strongly marked characters, and of these, Bayard, the "Chevalier sans peur et sans reproche," Gaston de Foix, Anne of Brittany, Marguerite, Queen of Navarre and author of the "Heptameron," and Diana of Poitiers figure in Colonel Haggard's pages. The title of the work is "Two Great Rivals," and it will be issued by Messrs. Hutchinson.

* * *

A NUMBER of interesting additions will shortly be made to Mr. Murray's "Albemarle Shilling Library," which has already made an excellent start. Among the volumes to appear later are Bishop Gore's "Sermon on the Mount," Mrs. Ady's "Painters of Florence," and Mr. A. C. Benson's "Thread of Gold" and "House of Quiet."

MEASURE AND POETRY.*

THE present age is, by common admission, under the presidency of reason, and it is, therefore, an age not very favorable to poets; yet the number of persons seriously attempting to write poetry nowadays is bewildering. This has puzzled many people; but perhaps an old fable may help us to understand it. The eagle, says the fabulist, deliberately and with foresight makes her nest thorny and uncomfortable, in order to encourage her youngsters to take flight as soon as possible. And this they do, finding it much more comfortable to "cleave the airy way" than to sit at home in the intolerable nest. May it not be even so with our flocks of minor poets? Not that the uncomfortable make of the age in which they were hatched was so built deliberately by the Mother Destiny, on purpose to urge as many of her brood as possible into the poetic æther; such a doctrine would itself be poetic, and so, nowadays, untenable. What is meant is simply that the age undoubtedly is uncomfortable in many ways for persons of poetic perceptions and poetic feelings, and such persons are, therefore, mightily tempted to flutter, however unskillfully, into the freedom of poetic self-expression, and also, since they are human, into print. Were the age otherwise, they might never be heard of; it is the pricking of their poetic skins that sends them aloft into poetry and print, just as the pricked young eagles are all agog to be flying. And arising out of this there is a further temptation—this time a serious one. For one who strongly feels what, without being unduly lax, we may call the poetic emotions, who knows, moreover, that such feeling is uncommon, and will carry one into a kind of writing which is, at least, typographically poetry—such an one is strongly tempted to believe that the possession of those emotions is enough to make one a poet. Thus, Miss L. ffolliott, in her "Songs and Fantasies," says roundly that to feel like a poet is to be a poet; but, in fact, she herself is an instance to the contrary. The very poem in which she makes her assertion begins thus:—

"If you were e'er scorched by consuming fire,
And felt all flow of words inadequate,
If you experienced oft a wild desire—
A striving to be something more than great."

No, that is not how a poet writes. From her verses it is evident that Miss ffolliott feels all that a poet should feel; but she has no diction to match it. She can herself vicariously experience a dramatic moment; but she cannot put it into poetic shape. What she lacks is the faculty of measure; and we have taken her (perhaps ungraciously) as an instance of the fact that poetic emotions are of no use for poetry without measure.

The huge majority of books of poetry published to-day are of this kind—full of the right thought and feeling, right in their kind, at least, but devoid of measure, save for its obvious species, metre. A book that might serve as a touchstone in this matter is Mr. William Porter's charming translation of the "Hyaku-nin-issui." Read in a book of modern poetry, and then read one of these "Hundred Verses from Old Japan," and you will certainly feel what is wrong with the former, if there is anything wrong with it. The translation may not be entirely adequate, but through it one can plainly see the chief wonderful characteristic of the original, the perfection of measure, in this antique Japanese poetry. The themes of the verses are usually slight, but always the thought is wrought into exquisite form, and the expression confined in a verbal shape of delicate rigor, like porcelain.

But the measure which we demand in poetry must not be taken to be only of a repressive, confining kind, a faculty of shaping matter, as it were, from the outside. By this repressive species of measure a man may certainly work his thoughts and feelings into something which is poetry. The process is really one of taste. In it, measure does the office of the gardener's shears, and prunes and shapes the poet's thought into some exquisite convention of topiary work. A good example is Mr. Edward Storer's "Ballad of the Mad Bird." The innermost idea is quite a good one, but nothing unusual—the quest of the First Beauty (or, as it is here called, Truth). Mr. Storer, however, has fashioned this into a charming fantasy, the detail of which, the diction and imagery, is deliberately curious and extravagant. This is natural; for the workmanship here is everything, and in the workmanship whatever originality Mr. Storer may have must appear. The same is true of most of Mr. Le Gallienne's "New Poems"; they are largely made of material which is the common stock of poets, shaped according to received taste; and any effect of novelty in them comes from the detail of the shaping, some curiosity of phrase, as when a night-jar is called "a toad of sound" and "Browning among the birds," and London becomes "that mighty sob, that splendid tear." No sensible person will quarrel with poetry which is made by this topiary-work kind of measure; when the shaping is really well done, it has the undeniable charm of all thoroughly artificial things. But, nevertheless, one soon tires of it, and it is refreshing to find in Mr. Le Gallienne's volume a little of the other kind of poetry, the poetry which has received its measure, not from without, but from within, from some internal energy that naturally makes for form; not from the gardener's shears, but from some strong propensity in the vital sap. Such are the political poems, "The Cry of the Little Peoples," and others, in which a genuine indignation has grown naturally into poetic form, and such are also a few lyrics, like one from Hafiz, of which the first verse runs thus prettily:—

"A Caravan from China comes;
For miles it sweetens all the air
With fragrant silks and dreaming gums,
Attar and myrrh—
A Caravan from China comes."

Little of the anxious external fashioning appears in Miss Ruth Young's slim book of poems, and there is no need of it. The substance of her poems has gone into form and measure by reason of an active virtue in the substance, like the virtue which compels the substance of a crystal to submit from within to the rigor of beauty. Miss Young has no need to borrow either matter or technique from the common stock of poetry; her matter is all her own, and her technique has no cultivated distinction. But, by reason of this crystallising power in her thought, she can make poetry of a theme like that of her title-poem, "The Philanthropists," a theme which is certainly not poetic until a poet makes it so. Still more to our purpose, as an instance of crystalline measure in poetry, is Mr. Cripps's "Lyra Evangelistica." Mr. Cripps is an African missionary, and the most of his poems deal with the experiences, the exultations and depressions, of his profession. This is poetic matter enough, but that would not, and certainly does not, in the hands of most missionary poets, make it poetry. But with Mr. Cripps his thought always crystallises; it has clean and true form, and will hold the light. "Lyra Evangelistica" is something much better than an earnest expression of deep feeling; it is a book of good poetry. The following, "In Deserto," will do for a fair specimen:—

"God's Fire-ball rolling smooth o'er heavens of glass, God's Hand-fed hawk with wide unfluttered gait,
Are o'er me—as feet wrench'd and worn I pass
By black-burnt clods, by sandy furrows strait.
They do their best so lightly, bird and sun,
But all my struggling leaves my best undone."

With Mr. Cripps, indeed, we are come to the poetry in which both kinds of measure are evident; there is the crystallising first, and then there is the polishing of the crystal. Mr. Ezra Pound would, no doubt, scorn to be thought a poet who polishes his crystals; but it does seem to us that in his "Exultations" he is beginning to allow some outward form to his verses. It was, indeed, remarkable that such a passionate lover of Dante, Villon, and the poets of Provence, should have been content with a savage and often ludicrous crudity of expression. He seemed to trust entirely to the formative power inherent in his ideas; but those ideas were neither very potent for form nor very interesting as poetic substance. In these "Exultations" of his he is less derivative in matter, his thoughts are often his own, and they are more intense, and, though not free from absurdity, the book contains much that is externally, as well as internally, captivating, as thus:—

"Pale hair that the moon has shaken
Down over the dark breast of the sea,
O magic her beauty has shaken
About the heart of me."

If Mr. Pound will go on with the development in method shown in this latest volume of his, he will add to English poetry something which is unusual riches, and not merely a set of curios. Two poems, at least, in "Exultations" give warrant for this; "Histrion," by virtue of its idea, and the "Ballad of the Goodly Fere," by virtue both of its idea and its execution.

After Mr. Pound's somewhat feverish eccentricities, "The Mountainy Singer" of Mr. Seosamh MacCathmhaoil (the brutal Saxon calls him Mr. Joseph Campbell) seems a book of serene orthodoxy. Yet not very many years ago most of it would have been called outrageously extravagant. That Mr. Campbell can be as modern as anyone, yet keep his work true to the ancient canons, let this exquisite little picture in unmetrical verse show:—

"Night, and I travelling.
An open door by the wayside,
Throwing out a shaft of warm yellow light.
A whiff of peat-smoke:
A gleam of delf on the dresser within:
A woman's voice crooning, as if to a child.
I pass on into the darkness."

With that incisive simplicity and subtle melody which is native in Ireland, Mr. Campbell writes of the earth and mankind, choosing for the latter those figures which have replaced kings and knights as poetic emblems of humanity, fiddlers, pedlars, and ploughmen. As in most modern Irish poetry, one is never very far off politics in Mr. Campbell's songs. Politics, in fact, interfuse the characteristic mixture of realism and mysticism. Several poems, for instance, are of ploughing; and the plough is always both a mystical and a political emblem. This is a strength and a weakness; the mysticism is more vehement for the politics, but it is also narrower. To say of a ploughman that "All life is bare

Beneath your share,
All love is in your lusty hands," is to make him a mystical figure; to say that, where the ploughman is not,

"The silence of unlaboured fields, Lies like a judgment on the air," is even more striking; but it is more politics than mysticism, and it is not altogether true. But when we come to "Grasslands are not wrought, Ploughlands swell with thought," we feel that politics and mysticism have kissed each other; and the meeting is memorable.

The late Eugene Lee-Hamilton was one of the finest of recent sonneteers; and he was a poet, therefore, in whom both kinds of measure were in exquisite balance. His thought went into poetic form as naturally as crystalline substance goes into its system of planes and angles; and his conscience would polish and smooth and purify until he came as near perfection as he might. Mrs. Lee-Hamilton, in a brief Preface to "Mimma Bella," describes the tragic suffering which made up most of his life; and it will always be a wonder that such poetic perfection came out of such physical distress. "Mimma Bella" is a sonnet-series in memory of his little daughter; and the tender familiarity of sorrowing reminiscence is invariably wrought elaborately into art. But good sonnets may not be described; only a sample can show what Eugene Lee-Hamilton's art could do:—

"Lo, through the open window of the room
That was her nursery, a small bright spark Comes wandering in, as falls the summer dark,
And with a measured flight explores the gloom.
As if it sought, among the things that loom
Vague in the dusk, for some familiar mark,

And like a light on some wee unseen bark,
It tacks in search of who knows what or whom?
I know 'tis but a fire-fly; yet its flight,
So straight, so measured, round the empty bed,
Might be a little soul's that night sets free;
And as it nears, I feel my heart grow tight
With something like a superstitious dread,

ROUND the Scottish Reformation there has waged a long and acrimonious controversy. In the fray, ecclesiastical and secular historians have created a din and dust, which have greatly tended to obscure the vision of the impartial student. According to one school of ecclesiastical writers, the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland was the Mother of Abominations, and in order to bring her evil reign to an end no measures could be too severe. Another, the moderate school, regrets the wholesale and indiscriminating manner in which the power of the Roman Catholic Church was broken, and, especially from an aesthetic point of view, deplores the iconoclastic rage of the Reformers against the ancient cathedrals, and all kinds of religious adornments. Another school, the purely secular, will have it that the Reformation was mainly brought about by a band of associates headed by Knox, who simply substituted one intolerant persecuting ecclesiastical power for another, much to the detriment of genuine liberty. The value of this important work of Dr. Hay Fleming is that by an appeal to historical documents he puts the whole Reformation period in proper focus. At no time is the great mass of the people roused to revolutionary pitch by doctrinal disputes and ecclesiastical controversies with regard to the relations between Church and State. Had there been nothing more than this, Knox would never have headed a national revolt against Rome.

In dealing with the side of the Roman Church which the people could understand, namely, the corruption of the clergy, Dr. Fleming quotes a remark of an old historian to the effect that the "great dissensions and occasions of heresies" were mainly due to "the corruption of morals and profane lewdness of life in churchmen of almost all ranks, together with crass ignorance of literature and all the liberal arts." Decisive evidence on this point is had in the letters which Dr. Fleming prints, written to Cardinal Betoun, by a kinsman, Archibald Hay, in which, referring to the prevailing corruption in the Church, he alludes to those priests who came to the heavenly table "who have not slept off yesterday's debauch," of whom he says "there is no greater danger to be feared from the most noxious animals than from this off-scouring of most abandoned men." But, after all, the most damaging evidence of the state of the pre-Reformation clergy is found in the Appendix, where Dr. Fleming gives a list of many hundreds of the sons and daughters of the celibate clergy of Scotland, recorded in official documents as having been legitimised between 1529 and 1559.

When regard is had to the terrible state of affairs revealed by Dr. Fleming, is it matter for wonder that the early reformers found congenial soil for their doctrines in Scotland, and that when they sealed their doctrines with their blood the popular feeling ran high in their favor—so high, indeed, that when Knox appeared upon the scene he had no difficulty in organising that feeling on a democratic basis, and by means of it breaking the political, as well as the ecclesiastical, power of Rome? In reference to the political side of the Reformation, too little credit has been given to Knox for his far-seeing sagacity in the sphere of statecraft. Dr. Hume Brown, who is an authority on these matters, has called attention to the wide-spread effects of Knox's influence in European politics. He says: "Had Mary on her return to Scotland found her people united in their allegiance to Rome, and their predilection for France, the course of British history must have been different from what it actually became. With three-fourths of her subjects Catholic, Elizabeth could not have held her own against a sovereign in Mary's position, backed by the dominant opinion of Europe." Thus it came about that by heading the Scottish revolt against Rome, Knox at the same time aided the cause of freedom in England, and converted the Reformation from a purely religious dispute into a great national, not to say an Imperial, movement.

It is a common taunt of the Buckle school of historians that in Scotland the Reformation simply meant the exchange of one despotism for another, and in defence of this view Buckle quotes innumerable instances of the continual interference of the Reform clergy with the morals and general habits of the people. Those who reason thus, overlook the fact that the moral laxity of the Roman Catholic régime made discipline a necessity if the reformation was to have ethical as well as religious results. And who was to exercise the necessary discipline? In our day, when the sacred and secular spheres are clearly defined, offences with which the Reformers dealt ecclesiastically are now dealt with secularly; but in the old days the Church had to undertake the work of social reform in the absence of any other organisation. Moreover, the leaders of the Reformation knew nothing of the modern doctrine of individual liberty. The community, not the individual, was the unit, as may be seen from the "First Book of Discipline," where it is laid down, in dealing with education, that no man, whether rich or poor, should be allowed to bring up his children according to his own fancy, but ought to be compelled to bring them up in learning and virtue with profit to the Church and the commonwealth. No doubt, the Reformers overdid their theory, but the remarkable fact remains that modern sociologists and politicians, in dealing with social problems, are going back to the principles which the Reformers embodied in the "First Book of Discipline."

So far from the Reformation being for Scotland simply a change of despotisms, it really sowed the seeds of the democratic sentiments which have profoundly influenced the national life. Take one of the democratic institutions of the Reformation, namely, Kirk Sessions, in which the congregations are represented along with the clergy. In the words of Dr. Fleming

"The benefits derived from the institution of kirk-sessions were not confined to ecclesiastical or religious matters. In them the people received, not only a large measure of local self-government in Church affairs, but by them they were indirectly trained and fitted to look after their civil rights. No doubt the burghs of Scotland had, for centuries before the Reformation, been ruled by town councils; but the members of these town councils were drawn from narrower circles—viz., from the guildry and incorporated trades—and outside the burghs there was no local self-government of any kind, saving that of the kirk-session. . . . Kirk-sessions were not infallible, neither were presbyteries, nor synods, nor general assemblies. It would be easy to point to decisions of these courts which to us seem tyrannical; but the tyranny was not the tyranny of one man; and if it were flagrant enough to rouse opposition, the people had the remedy in their own hands, so far, at least, as the kirk-session was concerned, at the next annual election."

Denunciation of the Reformers and the Covenanters used to be reckoned a mark of intellectual Liberalism. In this particular sphere the cult of the superior person is nearly extinct. Intelligent Scots are now too deeply versed in the history of their country to join in the campaign of depreciation which was started by Buckle and is continued by Mr. Andrew Lang. Dr. Hay Fleming's solid book should do much further to discredit the Buckle school, not so much by the opinions expressed, as by the mass of incontrovertible evidence by which the opinions are backed. As an historical work, Dr. Fleming's book will take high rank. The student of the Reformation will find it illuminating, and the historian indispensable.

"THE ADVENTURES OF MARIE LOUISE."*

In Marie Louise, Archduchess of Austria, Empress of the French, ex-Empress, and Duchess of Parma, the most impartial French biographer finds a difficult and unsympathetic subject. M. Frédéric Masson, in "L'Impératrice Marie Louise," writes only of the Empress. He prudently refrains from knowing either the ex-Empress or the Duchess of Parma. M. de Saint-Amand, who follows the lady through the leisurely stages of five or six volumes, decides that "she will occupy but a miserable place in history." A single volume, and a short one, has sufficed M. Max Billard for a memoir which is hostile, but without malice. It is a careful work, it gives the reader the security of ample references, and the translation has life and quality.

As Empress, Marie Louise is not at all an ungracious figure. It is necessary to bear in mind the circumstances in which, after Josephine's divorce, she came to France to share Napoleon's throne. Napoleon wanted an heir; but, dictator as he was at this era, he found it more difficult, as Dr. Lenz has observed, to choose a wife for himself among the princesses of Europe than he had done to select consorts for his relatives. Marie Louise was a bargain between Napoleon and the Emperor Francis. Francis handed over his favorite daughter to the man who had vanquished and humiliated him, and Napoleon presented her to France as the prize of his conquests. This was in 1810, when Napoleon, already the victor of many women, was forty-one, and Marie Louise a very unsophisticated schoolgirl of eighteen. About a year before this she had written to her father, concerning a battle that Napoleon was said to have lost: "May he lose his head, too!" An unseemly marriage in many ways, and hurried through at an unseemly rate.

It yielded, however, the heir that Cæsar (so unluckily for himself!) had insisted on; and, as we have said, the young Austrian, in her character of Empress, is by no means an ungracious figure. We cannot at the moment recall the name of the lady-in-waiting who made her royal mistress the subject of a pleasing little book, chiefly domestic. The Comte de Rambuteau, an intelligent and devoted chamberlain (who lived to begin in another office the beautification of Paris), tells us in his "Memoirs" that the very timidity of the youthful Empress invested her with a certain grace; "there was something so pathetically appealing about her." Sir Horace Rumbold, in the volume on Austria which we recently noticed, observes that Marie Louise's "innocent grace and tenderness and her innate and simple piety"—but her piety was really of the formal kind and tinged with bigotry—"made a profound impression on the most domineering spirit of the age." He notes also how she "from the first unconsciously took by storm" not only old Madame Mère, but those jealous intriguers, the Bonaparte sisters, Josephine's relentless enemies. This was a triumph, certainly; but we must remember that the women Bonapartes (that Roman matron, the mother, is excepted) were snobs, and Marie Louise was an Emperor's daughter.

Napoleon said at St. Helena that Marie Louise should have been a happy woman, for, though her reign was brief, the world was at her feet. She seems to have been happy enough, in a manner neither very original nor very imperial. Doubtless she was too young, and perhaps also at this date, too timid, to realise her position to the full; but we cannot altogether overlook her desperate lack of imagination. Josephine, even with the crown on, betrays a little of the gamine (everyone remembers how she "grewed" among the sugar-canes); but she addresses herself in a curious way to the fancy. We may be rating her in cold print for her goings-on with the booby Hippolyte Charles, or for the dreadful fibs she tells Bonaparte about her new necklace or her old debts; but we are always wondering, with quite real interest, what she is going to do next, and are always fain to admit that she was a completely human imperial woman. Josephine, however, was a Creole. The daughter of the towering House of Hapsburg and of the Germanic Cæsars, whose father was the last titular head of the great-sounding Holy Roman Empire—she was just a phlegmatic little German bourgeoisie. There is not, in the presence of Marie Louise, any question of heart-thumps; there is not so much as an accelerated movement of the pulse. Josephine was long in perceiving what was essentially great in Napoleon; Marie Louise seems never to have perceived it at all. The emotion of awe it was not in her to experience, but there were lesser heights of feeling which the lymphatic German could hardly scale. Thus, we cannot bring ourselves to think that Napoleon—whom in secret a thousand hearts worshipped from afar—was ever even intelligently admired by the second of the two women whom he crowned. Hence, when his Empire had rushed to ruin, she behaved as she could not but behave. She was dull of nature, and she was a faithful daughter of the august family that had produced and bred her. Faithful to her father, she deserted her husband and his cause. The thunder-peals of dissolution could scarcely leave her unmoved, for they heralded the loss of the most dazzling station a woman could occupy in the Europe of that date; but we have suggested that the full significance of this station was unrevealed to her imperfect understanding. Those claps of fate predicted also the complete dispossessing of her infant son, Napoleon's heir; but him too she abandoned. Napoleon passes, a setting of the sun or shooting of the dawn in the common round and travail of the world; his eagles sink, his "drums and trappings" cease; and, in the wreck, Marie Louise disappears, prompt to the call of her father, and bequeaths to France a memory as empty of heroism as of romance. Her great-aunt, Caroline of Naples (a lady who owed little to Napoleon) sent word to her through Méneval that she ought to have tied her sheets together and made off to Elba—but such romantic flights were not for Marie Louise.

Instead, she allows herself to be drawn into a basely concerted union with Neipperg. This one-eyed lady-killer, who was illegitimate, had seen service in the army and in diplomacy, and was a distinctly capable man of affairs. He was also most unscrupulous in his gallantries. At the time he laid siege to Marie Louise he was married to a woman whom he had carried off from her lawful husband. Metternich despatched him to pay court to the ex-Empress, and M. Billard hints that her father was privy to the plot. Neipperg triumphed. He became the lover of Marie Louise, and a daughter was born to them, "whose advent and baptism could only be mentioned with bated breath." This was in 1817, not two years after Napoleon's departure for St. Helena. A stranger thing happened. Neipperg's wife had died, and from the varied evidence gathered and presented by M. Billard, we are driven to the conclusion that Marie Louise was secretly and—in effect—bigamously married to him in 1820. Vainly is it asked how and by whom the marriage ceremony was performed. The guilty pair perhaps suborned some innocent rustic of a priest, or one who had saved his skin by abjuring his faith during the Revolution. Whoever he was, he stood within the danger of excommunication. It is a back-stair business, and the reader gets a shock from it. He can little forget that just before this unseemly union is accomplished, Marie Louise has silently allowed her son to be deprived of maternal inheritance and dynastic name, and that just after it, Napoleon, confronting death, is bidding doctor Antommarchi carry his heart to her in spirits of wine. The history of Neipperg as the husband of Marie Louise is comprised in a sentence: He administered the Duchy of the wife who bored him as if it had been the private estate of a mistress he adored.

Neipperg died in the winter of 1829. In 1829 France was filled with the spirit of the Romantics; and Marie Louise, putting her years behind her, was for romanticism at any cost. The Comte de Bombelles, an uninteresting, excellent man, tacked to the skirts of history as the third husband of the second wife of Napoleon, came to Parma, and was captured by her. She appointed him successor to Neipperg, proposed marriage to him, and seems almost to have marched him to the altar. Upon this marriage authentic history is silent. There are no documents, and the Comte de Bombelles has the credit of the man who refused to write.

It is a curious, and, in the main, a sordid story. The reader of it can scarcely help siding with the writer, whose summing-up leaves Marie Louise dishevelled and debased. On the whole, however, we cannot but think that in another generation there may be another word for her. Pushed as a girl into a marriage that instinctively revolted her, she made the best of it. She showed no heroism in Napoleon's defeat, and little decency in her desertion of him; but in the days that have been counted as a disgrace to her, she was still not much more than an unimaginative girl at the beck of a father who had machined her into a puppet. She is an uninteresting, unsympathetic, and unimaginative woman, with an unamusing strain of sensuality, who was largely spoiled by a training from which she never recovered.

ROMANTICS AND IMPRESSIONISTS.*

A PREFATORY note to "The Higher Life in Art" informs us that the six lectures on painters of the Barbizon School formed the first course of the Scammon Lectures, and were delivered by Mr. John La Farge at the Art Institute of Chicago in May, 1903. Published recently under the above somewhat cryptic title, they deal with Delacroix and Géricault, Millet, Decamps and Diaz, Rousseau, Dupré, Daubigny and Corot, and, more generally, with the whole artistic movement with which these names are connected. The lectures, we think, make their appearance in very much the same form as that in which they were delivered. They possess but few literary graces. Compared, let us say, with Reynolds's Discourses, or, to take a more modern instance, with those of Mr. Clausen, their surface is raw and unpolished. But they have several compensatory qualities; strong individual feeling, downright sincerity, and, above all, a convincing flavor of intimacy with the subject, and a firm grasp of its manifestations and their meanings. Their author is not a young man. He can remember several of the painters of whose work he writes, and that at a time when their work had obtained but little recognition; and he has spoken with those who remember still earlier painters. His lectures, therefore, have a good deal of the charm of a personal reminiscence, while at the same time the familiarity is not of the kind that detracts from the dignity of an utterance. His contribution on Delacroix is a peculiarly well-informed and introspective study of that master's art, which does much to bring him into line with the Fontainebleau group of which, strictly speaking, he was a precursor rather than a member.

Apart from Géricault and Delacroix, it is difficult, when one thinks of the artists who are generally accepted as being of the Barbizon School, to find many features that are common to all of them. On the contrary, sharp lines of division reveal themselves. Corot, for example, is identified with its landscape; but the landscape of Corot is very different in intention and achievement from that of Rousseau, Dupré, and Daubigny. Corot introduced figures into his landscape dreams, figures, too, of astonishing reality and power, and what is more, his close study of the human figure controlled in great measure the manner of his landscape. The sense of form, the beauty of line and curve, that mark the true figure-painter, are reproduced in Corot's pictures of the dawn and the evening, with the addition of values, of the relationship of tones, that formed his great contribution to the science of landscape-painting. Rousseau and his associates, on the contrary, were true landscapists, unaffected by the human element; Nature was all-sufficing to them, and it was her message alone that had to be interpreted. We have thus, to begin with, a line of demarcation between the two classes of landscapists in the group, between those who, like Corot and, to some extent, Decamps and Diaz, worked under the influence of human figure study, and those who, like Rousseau, approached nature from a wholly different point of view. Then there was Millet, a group by himself; humanity his sole concern; nearer, perhaps, to Corot than to Rousseau in his sympathies, but sufficiently far from both. Decamps was notorious for his disregard of those values which were one of Corot's high aims. Diaz, loved by everybody, was unlike anybody. It is difficult indeed to find any bond of unity between these so diverse artists except the bond that united them in opposition to Academic authority. Of this spirit of opposition, however, Mr. La Farge has a good deal to say. Authority had imposed on art a classical ideal that was exceedingly narrow, and against its narrowness the freer members of the profession rebelled. It was not a revolt against the past, but against its too narrow interpretation; these Romantic painters and the painters of Barbizon were contending for a wider view of what the past teaches.

It was as revolutionists of this kind—opponents of Academic authority—that the members of the Barbizon group were in the beginning accepted as guides by the painters who were afterwards to constitute the Impressionist

School. M. Theodore Duret, who writes so eloquently and with such intimate knowledge of this later group, reminds us that before the uprising of Manet the Impressionists were content to take Corot and Courbet as their masters. Manet, however, opened out for them an entirely new set of possibilities. Working in the face of bitter public opprobrium and of rejection after rejection by the Salon, he gradually forced it home upon them that the truthful painting of subjects in full daylight, be the subjects what they might, was at least as worthy an artistic aim as the academic concoction of landscapes or figure-pieces; that positive color was the artist's heritage, of which he should take the utmost advantage consistent with the real canons of art. Yet Manet does not wholly belong to the Impressionists as we recognise them in Pissarro, Monet, Renoir, or Cézanne. Only part of his output was the "open-air" painting that came to be their watchword; he has little to do with the chromatic developments of Monet and the pointillists. His position in French art is a solitary one; at times he seems a little near to Delacroix; at other times he ranges himself definitely with the new men. He stands, perhaps, in the same relation to the Impressionists as Delacroix to the Barbizon painters; with the difference that the phase of French art which he inspired was a far more violent change from what had gone before than any conceived by the Romantic artist. French tradition weighed considerably with Delacroix, who quarrelled only with the current manner of its interpretation; the Impressionists broke with tradition altogether. In this way Impressionism, which it is the fashion to regard as a French growth, was in reality non-national, a thing removed from that reverence for tradition and order which swayed, and still sways, the main current of French æsthetics. M. Duret's account of Manet, Pissarro, Claude Monet, Sisley, Renoir, Berthe Morisot, Cézanne, and Gillaumin is graphic in its details of the opposition encountered by these strugglers for independence, and of the physical hardship endured by those of them who were without private means of subsistence. Particularly valuable is his sketch of their influence upon German painting. In the case of Monet, considerations of space doubtless prevented the author from dealing at all fully with the technical theories of this master, and we get no more than a glimmer of the scientific side of his art—of that side which has been so amply discussed in Mr. Wynford Dewhurst's book on his master, and so brilliantly in Mr. W. C. Brownell's "French Art." But the work as a whole has great æsthetic insight, as well as the human charm that makes for interest, while the illustrations—with the exception of some of Manet's pictures which reproduce harshly in half-tone—are all that could be desired.

MORE BOOKS FOR "EVERYMAN."*

AGAIN we may congratulate Mr. J. M. Dent upon a further fifty volumes of "Everyman's Library," making four hundred and fifty in all. We have heard much of the best hundred books. Mr. Dent has discovered the best four hundred and fifty, and in his anxiety to do this he has even included the weirdest of all Lord Avebury's selection, "The Ramayana and the Mahabharata." Occasionally we come across a piece of actuality indeed, as when Captain Scott writes an introduction to Franklin's "Journey to the Polar Sea." There are books here that the present generation has forgotten, but will re-read with profit. Galt's "Annals of a Parish" is one of these, and Miss Martineau's "Feats on the Fjord" (a charming work) is another. Gibbon's "Decline and Fall" is here in six handy volumes. Plutarch's "Lives" in the form in which they are least known to the present generation—the famous "Dryden Plutarch"—are included. They were revised by Arthur Hugh Clough, who wrote a very fine introduction, here reprinted. The book was first published in 1864. For the practical reader this is a better book than North's "Plutarch," which has been many times reissued of late years. One other volume of history is Merivale's "Rome," an excellent and serviceable introduction to the same writer's "History of the Romans Under the Empire," a book which Mr. Dent may well be persuaded to add to the series. Finally, that now established classic, Rawlinson's "Herodotus," originally published in four volumes in 1858, is here supplied in two.

Fiction we have in one of Ainsworth's novels, a pleasant demonstration that a favorite novelist of our boyhood was still vitality, and indeed "The Tower of London" is as much worth reading to-day as it was half a century ago. "Pendennis" is here, and "The Swiss Family Robinson," also Henry Kingsley's fine story, "Geoffrey Hamlyn." Altogether the fiction in these reprints makes one feel young again. These are precisely the books that as boys we devoured most eagerly. Many will welcome the two volumes of "Gil Blas," a book much more frequently praised than read. The lover of poetry will rejoice in so well printed an edition of Spenser's "Faerie Queene," and this in spite of Macaulay's famous comment that "few and weary are they who are in at the death of the blatant beast," a pleasing indication that even Macaulay's voracious appetite for reading stopped short at good poetry, for the "blatant beast" does not die. Mr. Saintsbury, on the other hand, has declared that the "Faerie Queene" is the one poem in our language that he wishes were longer.

In wandering pleasantly through these fifty treasures of literature, we ask ourselves whether the introductions are a help or a hindrance. We have no hesitation in praising the bibliographies, or, at least, some of them. Not all are thorough. A bibliography at the beginning of a book is essential, so also are a few biographical details. Opinions, on the other hand, we are inclined to deem little better than impertinence. There is an impertinence of praise as well as of blame. Criticism may be acceptable in a newspaper, and sound criticism in a volume of essays is most welcome. But what right has Smith or Jones to fix his opinions of Thackeray, or of Dickens, of Maria Edgeworth, or of Dumas, in front of a book by one of these authors: here we cannot escape him. Yet there are introductions that more than justify themselves. The half-dozen pages, for example, that Mr. A. R. Waller has added to Florio's "Montaigne" are a case in point. The note that Mr. Austin Dobson has added to the "Plays and Poems of Oliver Goldsmith" is entirely satisfactory, although this we have read before. In any case, with introductions or without introductions, fifty volumes of the best authors, many of them not too accessible hitherto, thus thrown broadcast among the English-speaking race—and not merely fifty volumes, but four hundred and fifty—write down their publisher as a benefactor of his race, and, we hope, a good business man as well.

AN UNORTHODOX STORY-TELLER.*

THE ban of the circulating libraries, with one exception, has, we are informed, now fallen on Gorky's last novel, "The Confession." Probably the title seemed suspicious and, on examination, passages must have proved as "doubtful" as many in the Confessions of St. Augustine. Probably the unexpurgated editions of the saint's masterpiece are now on the "reserved list," for it is clear that the Latin father and the Russian author should be expelled from the temple together. Both desire "joy in the truth," and both describe the inner struggle between a man's spiritual nature and the terrors and evils of life. It is true that predestination, man's fall and corruption, which St. Augustine preached with such zeal, are doctrines dismissed by Gorky with abhorrence, but both writers denounce worldly impurity with the directness that is regarded as pernicious in library circles.

"A Confession" is by no means artistically a success. Gorky's moral purpose is too overpowering for that, and, no doubt, his exile from Russia is drying up the living springs of his talent. But the book, which takes the shape of a direct attack on the Russian clergy, is of interest because this man of the people is seen searching in anguish of spirit for a new religion, a faith that may stand firm amid the crumbling ruins of supernatural dogma. The result is an inner ferment out of which the vague idea persistently emerges that "the spirit of the people, the immortal people, is the only parent of gods that have been and are yet to come." In time to be, a new ideal will be shaped for the whole world. "The actual god with whom your mind is occupied—a god of beauty, wisdom, justice, and love"—will be the human ideal deified, but no longer raised into the region of the supernatural. There is nothing specially original in this thought, but Gorky's intense faith in common humanity is sung as a Credo: "All that is on earth, all that lives in your mind, all that—has been created by the people; whereas the aristocrats have given only the final polish to the work."

Matve, the hero of "A Confession," is an illegitimate child, who is adopted "out of sheer boredom," by the kind sacristan, Hilarion, in the village of Sokol. Hilarion is an original person, who is not afraid to tell the peasants that the devil is an invention, and that the forces of evil are man's bestiality and stupidity. When the police inspector and the parish priest scheme together to extract money from the ignorant villagers, and a miraculous picture of "The Burning Thornbush" is found shining at the bottom of the well, and the peasants are urged to bring their offerings and build a chapel on the sacred spot, Hilarion betrays the imposture. The sacristan is, however, drowned soon after this, and Matve, who has earned a reputation for devoutness, and is called "the little saint," goes to live with Titov, the land-bailiff. Titov is an unjust steward, who uses his power by fleecing the peasants on the one hand, and by defrauding the great landowner, Lossev, on the other. Titov's idea is that sin—and his whole life is sin—may be compounded for by prayer. "Pray very fervently for me, and all my family, Matve," he says. "That will be my reward for having received you beneath my roof and cherished you." But when Matve falls in love with his daughter Olga, Titov insists that his future son-in-law must join with him in robbing the weak. "Whilst I was wading in the mire of sin," says Titov, "you were living an honest life, and would even like to continue living honestly—at the cost of my sinning. It is easy enough for an honest man to enter Paradise—if a sinner carries him there on his back. Far better that you should do the sinning." Matve succumbs to temptation, in order to gain Olga. Their marriage is a happy one, but Matve's soul is always uneasy. He sees sin triumphant everywhere. "The God of glory sits far, far away, enthroned in all His majesty and might, while men herd together in misery and need. Man's soul is blinded by the black misery of life. Where in them is the strength of the Father's love? Where, in short, is God, and where is the divine?" Olga dies in childbed, and Matve is distraught, and wanders away, cursing God. He can get no satisfaction from the priests, nothing to ease his aching misery. He goes to a learned arch-priest to confide his doubts about God's mercy, and the priest crushes him with his anger, tells him he is a lying heretic, and threatens him with the police. Matve escapes, and is sheltered by a humane girl, Tatiana, a Magdalen, who tells him that his thoughts about God are "much too bold," and that he must go and consult holy Mother Fevronia the anchorite. Matve decides, after pondering, that the best thing he can do is to enter a Sabbatine monastery, where in study and meditation he may find inner peace. But the life led by the monks is even more ugly than that of the peasants. Hatred and malice, and the lusts of the flesh trouble the souls of the austere, while others, like Father Antonius, the aristocrat who has retired from the world, use their money to procure vicious pleasures in secret. Cards, women, and wine are not strange to the monastery. In drawing this picture of monkish hypocrisy, Gorky does not seem to be writing from observation but from hearsay. The whole effect is lopsided, and there is little to differentiate it from the class of medieval satires on the life monastic. In disgust with his surroundings, Matve breaks his vows and turns pilgrim, attaching himself to those bands of poor wanderers who traverse Russia, aimlessly passing from shrine to shrine, begging their bread as they go. But there is no living truth in their life. "They collect the discourses of pious monks, the prophecies of hermits and anchorites, and then distribute them among themselves, just as children do the fragments of a broken vessel. Finally I saw no men, only the ruins of a wasted life, dirty human dust, which floats over the earth, and is whirled by all the winds to the steps of churches." What strikes Matve most of all is that man does not seek God, but only oblivion of his individual grief. His is "the vain anxiety to get rid of his wretchedness, so he tries to avoid action of any kind, dreads to take his part in life, and seeks only a quiet corner wherein to hide himself." Everywhere Matve finds people embittered by suffering, believing only in evil, thinking and rejoicing in evil desperately. In their misery they have no pity for others' sorrow; they lie down before the strong, but they are wolves where the weak are concerned. And "there is no God for the poor . . . no." "He who is replete seeks only to justify the fact that his belly is full while all around him are starving." In despair with this "narrow, bitter, cruel, everyday life," in which even the seemingly benevolent look for their gain in a future life, saying in their prayers, "Don't forget, O God, how much I have paid you!" Matve tries fresh experiences. He becomes a town workman, but factory life seems a stupid and narrow sort of existence. "Everybody was chained to a task and moved all his life long in the same groove, like a dog on a chain." He recalls that he has felt most happiness when he has been alone, at night, resting on the earth under the stars. "You feel intensely the richness of life, and earth herself becomes alive beneath your feet, and seems so full of sap, so familiar and home like."

Although "A Confession" doubtless suffers from the translation being made from the German and not from the Russian edition, it is perfectly clear that Gorky's artistic sense, never very strong, is fast perishing, in proportion as his ethical and social propaganda waxes powerful. His style is cloudy, his picture vague, his characters have no individuality, and the development of his narrative is absolutely artless. His aim is now to propagate ideas, not to depict life. The communistic ideal that is so deeply implanted in the Russian soul is, perhaps, sapping the audacious individualism that originally marked him out as a new force in Russian thought. Perhaps Gorky has done his work. But whether or no, he at least has not compounded with the enemy. His voice is still uplifted in defence of the right to happiness of the poor and the weak.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"THE knowledge that the House of Lords can at any time force a dissolution by throwing out the financial proposals of the Government would be, of itself, sufficient to make it necessary so to compose a Ministry that it can command the support of that House." This sentence of the Lord Chancellor's in the introduction to Professor J. H. Morgan's little book, "The Lords and the Constitution" (Methuen, 1s.), well serves to mark the organic connection between the narrower financial issue between Lords and Commons, and that larger issue which is now absorbing public attention. Professor Morgan's chapters, most of which appeared originally as articles in the "Westminster Gazette," constitute the most acute and accurate indictment of the constitutional action of the Lords in rejecting the Finance Bill that has appeared. In clear and precise terms the writer describes the position and powers of the Lords in our Constitution, and makes evident from history and accepted authorities the place occupied by usage and convention in the exercise of "legal" powers, so enforcing the exact nature of the breach of the Constitution committed last November. Constitutionally this action was a revolution, undermining suddenly the slowly built edifice of financial control by the Commons. Politically it was a revolution, in that it implied in the future the destruction of the balance of the party system in our scheme of representative government, by depriving one of the great parties of that power of the purse which is essential to their efficiency as a legislative and administrative organ. The willingness of prominent statesmen, and in a few instances jurists, to repudiate all obligations to obey conventions is an amazing revelation of the reckless opportunism to which the party of Conservatism is willing to resort in the defence of "interests" which they deem to be assailed. "Oral tradition, precedent, usage, and a consensus of authoritative opinion in the text-books," all the pillars of authority supporting the conventions of the Constitution, are thrown over not merely by "wild peers," by damning of consequences, but by grave representative statesmen and lawyers like Lords Lansdowne and Halsbury. It is true that the ablest lawyers and laymen of their party denounced their revolutionary course, but the damage done in the delicate sphere of precedent is only repairable by such formal organic change as the Government has now under consideration. In an interesting Supplementary Chapter, Professor Morgan strongly controverts the view that a Ways and Means resolution of the Commons suffices to give legal authority for the collection of taxes. Politicians who desire a clear understanding of the nature of the offence charged against the Lords cannot do better than peruse this setting of the case.

HEAVEN AND ITS WONDERS, AND HELL.

MR. PERCY ALLEN'S "Impressions of Provence" (Griffiths, 12s. 6d. net) is a gossip and agreeable book of travel which not only deals with Provence, but also takes the reader to Carcassonne and other places that lie outside the boundaries of the true Provence. He begins by a visit to Orange and thenceforward wanders through the district of his choice, following no definite plan, and only describing what arouses his own personal interest, sometimes turning aside to visit an outlying town or village, and sometimes pausing to narrate an old legend. He gives an account of an interview with Mistral and tells us something—though we should have liked more—of the doings of the félibres, describes Tarascon, where Daudet is not yet forgiven for his "Tartarin," and becomes enthusiastic about Les Martigues, "the Venice of the South." Arles, famous for the beauty of its women, and the bloodlessness of its bull fights, comes in for a large share of Mr. Allen's attention, but a different story has to be told of Nîmes, where, though the women are also beautiful, the bull fights are exhibitions of wanton and sickening cruelty. Mr. Allen seems to have written his book solely to please himself, with the result that he will also please the great majority of his readers. The very name of Provence calls up light-heartedness, and Mr. Allen writes of it in a corresponding spirit.

"HINTS FOR LOVERS," by Mr. Arnold Haultain (Constable, 4s. 6d. net), is a series of epigrams strung together by connecting conjunctions and adverbs, which rather take away from their effect. The epigram, as most who have tried it will agree, is not an easy form of writing—or reading. Mr. Haultain, however, maintains a fair average. We add a few of his efforts: "A woman's emotions are as practical as a man's reason." "A girl thinks she detects flippancy in seriousness. A woman thinks she detects seriousness in flippancy." "It is only the man who thinks he is too venturesome." "Ideal matrimony is founded on a mono-metallic basis: no amount of silver will be accepted for gold." "Matchmaking is one of the most fascinating of feminine avocations." "If the sexes were to change places more marriage licences would be taken out."

MR. J. H. RITSON, in his "Abroad for the Bible Society" (Robert Cullery, 3s. 6d. net), apologises for its shortcomings profusely enough to disarm the most captious of critics. The book is the record of a seven months' tour in China and Japan, Korea, Manchuria, and Siberia, and like most works of its class, it deals rather superficially with a great many phases of life in these countries, and thoroughly with none. The pious ejaculations, which seem to have been implanted in evangelical literature since the days of George Borrow, are not wanting; and we deprecate, not merely the seeming ignorance of, but also the attitude of mild pleasantries adopted towards, the great non-Christian religions that still exert some influence in the Far East. Otherwise, the narrative is readable enough, and we get valuable glimpses of travel conditions in Siberia and elsewhere, not to mention a deal of information regarding the missionaries and native colporteurs who assist in the distribution of the Bible Society's publications. An unusually liberal supply of photographic illustrations adds to the attractions of the volume.

THE decision of the Directors of the Bank of England to raise their rate was not a surprise, but the jump from 3 to 4 per cent. was a big step, and its consequences may be considerable. New York especially will dislike the change, for Wall Street just now is nervous and despondent. The American market is suffering from various causes. First of all there are the labor disputes, due to discontent at the rising cost of all the comforts and necessities of life. The strikes and lockouts in Philadelphia and in the cotton and thread mills of Massachusetts and Rhode Island have been disquieting. But the threat of a general railway strike on the lines west of Chicago is still more alarming. Then again the probability of a tariff war between the United States and Canada has upset the Markets. For such a war the Aldrich-Paine Tariff would be held responsible, and rightly so; and this may easily bring about a heavy defeat of the Republican Party. Stock markets which are bolstered up by the Trust magnates cannot contemplate such a prospect with equanimity. Altogether the outlook for both American and Canadian securities is decidedly cloudy. Meanwhile the boom in rubber and rubber shares has continued unabated, and the last Stock Exchange account is one of the heaviest on record. The quantity of transactions has been seldom equalled, and experts go back to the Kaffir boom of 15 or 16 years ago for a parallel. The bankers' clearing house made a record last Wednesday, and the trade with India is also remarkably heavy.

MONEY AND THE BUDGET.

The stringency of the money market may be partly due to the suspension of the Budget. For if the Income-tax had been collected in the usual way there would not have been such low market rates in the last few weeks. Cheap money has led to gold exports, and these again in their turn have tightened up the market and produced the 4 per cent. rate. It is generally expected that this rate will bring gold from Europe and also—unless the financiers prevent it—from the United States. As for the Budget, the City would like to see the ordinary Income-tax collected. But the super tax is very unpopular with those who would have to pay it.

NEW YORK BONDS.

The issue last week of New York City 4¹/₄ per cent. gold bonds at par, irredeemable until 1930, provides an attractive investment, as they are either in coupon or registered form. The London issuing house is Messrs. Seligman Bros. Until the latter part of 1907 New York paid less than 4 per cent. for capital, but in September of that year 4¹/₂s brought only a fraction above par. The last offering, in December, 1909, was disposed of on an income basis of 3·98 per cent., but since then the quotation has fallen appreciably below the issue price of 100 1-3. The retrenchments enforced by the new administration may re-establish confidence in New York City's obligations. For many years the City did not receive an adequate quid pro quo for each dollar spent, but this is being changed. Economies have already been effected more than sufficient to pay the interest on $50,000,000 at 4¹/₄ per cent.—$2,125,000. Nevertheless, for the moment at any rate, the supply of New York bonds exceeds the demand. Hence what seems a favorable opportunity. The security is at least as good as that of Copenhagen, which is borrowing at 4 per cent. On the other hand the issues of American railroad and industrial bonds, as well as the short term obligations financed on this side, have been so heavy that any immediate recovery of this market is extremely improbable.

Diary of the Week.

THE Asquith Resolutions have been produced, and, as a result, the Liberal sky, as Sir Charles Dilke said to a Parliamentary interviewer, is now "as blue as blue can be." The Resolutions are entitled "Relations between the two Houses and the duration of Parliaments." They are three in number, and deal exclusively with the Veto, leaving the reconstruction of the Lords to a later day. The first resolution proposes to disable the House of Lords "by law" from "rejecting or amending" Money Bills, and leaves the Speaker the power of defining in each case what a Money Bill means. In other words, he will decide that if the Bill covers the following matters, it cannot be touched by the Lords:—

"The imposition, repeal, remission, alteration, or regulation of taxation: charges on the Consolidated Fund or the provision of money by Parliament: Supply: the appropriation, control, or regulation of public money: the raising or guarantee of any loan, or the repayment thereof: or matters incidental to those subjects or any of them."

* * *

THE second resolution proposes that if a Bill has passed the Commons in three successive sessions, and has three times been rejected by the Lords, it "shall become law without the consent of the House of Lords on the Royal assent being declared." An interval of two years must elapse between the introduction of the Bill and its final passage, and under the resolution the Lords can only propose amendments accepted by the House of Commons, all others being considered as equivalent to rejection. Finally, the third resolution limits the duration of Parliament to five years—a change foreshadowed in Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's speech in 1907.

* * *

THE Asquith plan follows that of Campbell-Bannerman, and is, on the whole, simpler and stronger. It differs from its predecessor in two main particulars. The machinery of conferences between the two Houses, following on each rejection by the House of Lords, is done away with, and instead of enacting that the decision of the Commons must prevail within the limits of a single Parliament, the Government proposes that it shall prevail within the limit of two years. In other words, the old idea of carrying on Bills from one Parliament to another is revived, with excellent effect. This gets rid of the most serious objection to the Campbell-Bannerman plan—namely, that it left barren the two last years of a Liberal Parliament. The reports from the country show that the Resolutions have greatly cleared and strengthened the situation with the Irish and with the Labor Party, as well as with the Liberal forces.

* * *

THE two Houses of Parliament have been engaged in a general bout of electioneering. The Government is building "Dreadnoughts" for the purpose of sinking, not so much German vessels, as Tory "scare-ships." Irishmen criticise the Government's tactics on the Budget with one eye on Mr. Lloyd George and the other on Mr. O'Brien. Finally, the House of Lords, the latest comer in this window-dressing competition, has outpaced all its rivals. The proceedings should be carefully followed in the reports. A Tory revolt developed against the third Rosebery resolution, declaring that the possession of a peerage should not of itself give the right to sit and vote in the House of Lords. This merely affirmed the old distinction between a Peer and a Lord of Parliament, and, in fact, meant nothing. Lord Rosebery stated that he had neither a "definite Bill" nor a "definite plan" behind his resolutions; and Lord Lansdowne admitted that a peer could vote for the third motion "with the full intention of afterwards proposing that this House should consist entirely of hereditary peers." The Lord Chancellor added "that it was compatible with these resolutions that this Chamber should be composed either of all hereditary peers, all nominated peers, or elected peers, or any possible combination between these three."

* * *

THUS encouraged, and justified, it appears, by private assurances dropped by the friends of the Rosebery motion into the ears of the backwoodsmen, the Lords proceeded to pass the Resolution by a majority of 175 to 17, the Government half-contemptuously adding their votes to those of the Unionist peers, while those indomitable Nestors, Lord Halsbury and Lord Wemyss, told for the minority. The former led a caustic attack on the Rosebery policy, or half-policy. Had not Lord Rosebery said that the House of Lords was the only public place where truth was freely spoken, and yet he now wished to discredit it? Was he still working for Home Rule, as when, in 1894, he "appealed to his

THE peers received Lord Halsbury's speech with acclamation, in contrast with the stony silence amid which the Rosebery "tactics" were developed. The backwoodsmen were still more vocal. Lord Bathurst thought that the motion "originated with the Socialists," and asked the Lords to beware lest their children of the third and fourth generation should "rend" them or their phantoms. Lord Rosebery could only bow to the storm, after deprecating the use by Lord Killalín of such ill-omened words as "vested interests," which the electors might hear, and the Resolutions passed the Committee on the understanding that, as the Lord Chancellor said, no one was committed to them. After Easter there are to be more resolutions, but no plan.

* * *

THE Prime Minister spoke at Oxford on Friday week, declaring the problem of urgency for Liberals to be the limitation of the Lords' Veto, which "must go"—a sentence which provoked the great demonstration of the meeting. There was no question of Single-Chamber rule, for the Government believed in the bi-cameral system, but when they dealt finally with the House, they could accept no coat of democratic whitewash, but must rebuild the structure from the bottom. He insisted that the Government had a mandate to pass the Budget, and must fulfil it, but there should be conciliation and mutual understanding between sections of the Progressive forces.

THIS line—that the Veto was the dominant issue, but that the Government were bound to pass the Budget—was also taken by Mr. Churchill, speaking on Saturday at Manchester. The Rosebery policy meant the destruction of the power of the Crown to create peers, and thus broke down the last resource of Crown and people against the oligarchy. The Government, on the other hand, stood for the supremacy of the House of Commons, and that could only be reached through the abolition of the Veto. As for reform of the Lords, Liberals would only tolerate it on the lines that a renewed House should be democratic, politically fair, and subordinate to the Commons. As for the Budget it was an essential part of the Government's quarrel with the Lords. The Irish cry of "No Veto, no Budget," was without terrors for the peers; indeed, it was exactly what they wanted, for they loathed the Budget and abominated the idea of curtailing the Veto. For these reasons, and because the Budget was the foundation of their social policy, the Government must go forward with it whether they were shot down or no.—Mr. Haldane, speaking the same night to the Eighty Club, rehearsed the case for reform, but said significantly that there were occasions when the "ancient and reserved position of the Sovereign" had to emerge from the "sea of constitutional restrictions which obscured it."

* * *

MEANWHILE, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, who wants his father's quickness and Mr. Balfour's adroitness, has given away the Opposition's charge that the Government, and not the Lords, have "engineered chaos." His speech on Monday, said the Chancellor, ought to have been delivered in support of the Government's plan to end the financial interference of the Lords. They had produced chaos for months; while, even on the Opposition's showing, the Government were only responsible for it for weeks. But even if they were wrong, would the Opposition end the trouble? Did they not hope to bring the Government to grief on the Budget? "Hear, hear!" replied the incautious Mr. Chamberlain. It is clear, therefore, that if the Opposition can kill the Budget, they will do it, with the result that there will be more confusion, "engineered" or not.

* * *

The Free Trade campaign has properly been opened afresh, though on new lines of organisation. The Unionist Free Trade Club has been dissolved, at the instance of Lord Cromer, on the ground that its members were no longer united as to the relative importance of Free Trade and other issues. Its place is, therefore, to be taken by a new body, calling itself the Constitutional Free Trade Association, and governed by gentlemen who are more concerned to defend property than Free Trade. On the other hand, some of the ablest of the Free Trade Unionists, including Lord James, Sir Frederick Pollock, and Mr. Arthur Elliot, have declined to put Free Trade in the background, and decided to join the Free Trade Union. The united body held a great demonstration in the Queen's Hall on Tuesday, under the chairmanship of Lord James, who said that those who preached Protection did not realise to-day what it had meant in the life of the English laboring poor. Sir Edward Grey made a skilful defence of the Free Trade position, the main points of which were that a tariff could never effectually distinguish between raw materials and manufactured goods, that it would introduce an element of "wrangling and bargaining" into future Colonial Conferences, and that even if it began on some pseudo-scientific plan, it would end in a scramble between constituencies to get "a slice from the tariff pie."

* * *

THE "Municipal Reformers" having failed to induce the Progressives to run London "by agreement," have proceeded to pack the Council with Moderate Aldermen, consisting partly of rejected candidates and partly of representative Conservatives of both sexes, including Lady St. Heliers. Two so-called neutral Aldermen were allowed the Progressives, but one of them was Mr. Harold Cox, the apostle of the administrative Nihilism which now rules the London County Council. The majority then gave themselves sweeping majorities on the Committees. To the Highways Committee, for example, only six Progressives were allotted, though this body owes most to the experience of the earlier Progressive members and their successors on this Council. These proceedings are in marked contrast with the moderate use made by the Progressives in 1905 of an electoral situation almost parallel to that of March 5th. In spite of these precautions the majority were beaten, after an all-night sitting, on a proposal to pay two women folders and sewers at the rate of 4d. an hour.

THE revolt of the "insurgent" Republicans against the old gang of party "bosses" culminated on Saturday in the signal defeat of the Speaker, "Joe" Cannon. This clever, virile, but defiantly Philistine personage, whose backwoods manners (he often presides in his shirt sleeves, and is currently known as "foul-mouthed Joe") endear him to the average Congressman, has for nearly a generation incarnated the machine politics of the Republican Party, its stolid resistance to every species of reform, and its business alliance with most of the interests and all the Trusts. A combination of the Insurgents with the Democrats carried a Bill by a majority of 191 to 155 by which the Rules Committee of the House is enlarged, and Mr. Speaker Cannon excluded from it. The American Speaker is in practice rather the Leader than the Chairman of the House, and the Rules Committee which he used to nominate and control, in so far as it drafts and prepares legislation, has many of the functions of a Cabinet. The party machine is for the moment smashed. The debates, which lasted two days, were highly emotional, not to say hysterical. In the end the personal feelings of Mr. Cannon were salved. The Democrats proposed to depose him from the Speakership, but to this the "Insurgents" would not consent. The old man survives to enjoy his popularity, but his power is gone.

THE last word has not yet been said in the tariff controversy between Canada and the United States. On Sunday, Mr. Fielding rather unexpectedly met Mr. Taft at Albany, and suggestions of compromise are, naturally, in circulation. The new basis of negotiation is believed to be that the States allow to Canada the minimum scale of the Payne tariff, that Canada makes concessions on a number of American articles, notably iron and steel goods, and a "united reciprocity agreement" shall follow. It is doubtful what the result will be. Canada is clearly in the stronger position. Public opinion there seems to be firm in resisting any concessions whatever. On the other hand, the American industries, which would be ruined by the exclusion of Canadian raw material, notably lumber, are clamorous against the application of the extreme clauses of the Payne tariff. The victory of the "insurgents" in the House of Representatives has made it less than ever likely that any rash use will be made of the unpopular Payne tariff.

* * *

THE so-called "agreement" between Austria and Russia, about which so much noise was made some weeks ago, has at last been given to the world. It amounts, as we predicted, only to this—that the diplomats of the two countries, who had for many months dispensed with all verbal intercourse, and confined themselves to written communications, will now consent to meet each other face to face. The political significance of such an "agreement" is rather less than nothing. There are, of course, in the published semi-official statements the usual phrases about the status quo in the Balkans. Meanwhile, King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, having concluded his stay in Russia, is being entertained at Constantinople—the first royal visitor to the new régime. King Peter of Serbia has followed his neighbor in a visit to the Russian Court, which will also be completed by a journey to Constantinople. These movements are intended to suggest, if not to prepare, the formation of a Balkan Federation, with Turkey as its leading partner and Russia as its patron. We are sceptical, but it is worth noting that the "Tanin," the official Young Turkish organ, writes with notable cordiality both of Bulgaria and of Russia, whose clever new Ambassador, M. Tcharikoff, seems to have made a conquest of the Young Turks—as he formerly did of the Servian regicides.

THE utter disgust of the Duma at its own impotence betrays itself in violent and disorderly scenes, in which the Reactionaries take the lead in provoking the Left. M. Homiakoff, the President, has resigned in despair, and has been succeeded by M. Gutchkoff, the Octobrist leader. M. Homiakoff, in a published statement, reveals the utter hopelessness of the present position. The Duma can do nothing, and might as well not exist. Its late Speaker, himself the most moderate of the Octobrists, blames "the attitude of certain ministers, the general policy of the Government, and the legislative boycott of the Upper House," also the studied absence of the Premier from the sittings of the Duma. The antics of the Reactionaries, who seek to discredit the Duma by creating "scenes," are carried out, the ex-Speaker ventures to say, "under stimulus from high quarters." In plain words, the Black Hundreds are the Royalist party, and in the Duma, as outside it, they are acting for the Tsar. The "Times" correspondent, who says that in the personality of M. Gutchkoff lies "the only hope of saving the Duma," seems to think something in his tastes and his interests may appeal to the good nature of the Tsar. By such thin threads hangs the Russian Constitution.

THERE is apparently no end to the humiliations which the Military League is determined to heap on civilian government in Greece. It has now demanded a "purgation" of the army, which means the dismissal of all officers who do not think with it, and also an alteration of the electoral law in the sense of smaller electoral districts. It is not many weeks since it demanded larger electoral areas at the point of an ultimatum. Both demands are being satisfied. Meanwhile the consequences of the demand which it put forward the other day, in a transient moment of altruism, for instantaneous agrarian reform in Thessaly, are in bloody fruit. The peasants failing to receive the instant reforms which the officers demanded, have begun to riot, and many lives have been lost—for the army is apparently quite as ready to shoot the peasants down as it is to coerce the Cabinet. Thessaly certainly needs agrarian reform. Unluckily, Greece has no money to finance a scheme of land purchase, and if she had, Turkey would refuse to allow her to expropriate the numerous Moslem landowners, whose rights are defined by treaty.

* * *

WE are glad to see the record of the results of the scheme of afforestation set up jointly by the Local Government Board and the Leeds Corporation in the Washburn Valley. The scheme has been developing since 1905, fed by grants from Mr. Burns's Department. Within that period it has planted 638 acres with 2,523,000 trees, at a cost of £9,643, and has paid in wages £5,678 17s. 2d. The weekly average of men employed has been small, but the totals are considerable. On the whole, the work seems to have been economically done, and to have shown good moral results. It certainly offers an excellent working model for further experiments under the Development Act.

* * *

OXFORD has won the Boat Race by $3\frac{1}{2}$ lengths, having rowed the course in 20 minutes 14 seconds. Her crew led continuously from Harrod's, and at Barnes Bridge, where few races are left undecided, were two lengths ahead. There was little of a race after the first mile and a-half. The winners were one of the most powerful and quite the heaviest crew that ever rowed at Putney, but their earlier crudeness and faults of style made some critics doubtful whether Cambridge might not just row them down. These doubts vanished before the day of the race. Oxford retained the length and strength of their stroke, the firm and steady appearance of which was verified in the trials with scratch crews, while Cambridge still rowed short, and showed weakness at the finish of the stroke.

Politics and Affairs.

TO RESTORE THE CONSTITUTION.

THE Liberal Party will be content to see that, in the terse and workmanlike resolutions now before the country, the Government adhere in the main to the line of attack on the House of Lords marked out for them, after careful consideration of the alternatives, by the Cabinet of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. Common sense and the instinct of the people then and now have approved this tactic, and its acceptance by a majority of about one hundred members of this Parliament will attest its wisdom as practical politics. The scheme now proposed for the re-establishment of representative government in this country differs in four respects from the resolution of June, 1907. When that motion was proposed, the Lords had only violated the general spirit of the Constitution. Last November they broke through the foundation of its law and custom. Therefore all power of dealing with Money Bills has to be formally reserved to the Commons, and the Speaker is made the judge of where the province of finance begins and ends. On their side the Lords are still protected by their resolution against tacking, but now that the old, "flexible" British Constitution is, thanks to the peers, to stiffen into written forms, the powers of the Upper House will be under an Act of Parliament, and they will have to yield obedience to it. The second change is less important. The machinery of conferences between the two Houses is done away with, and the Lords are given a choice of taking or leaving a measure sent up to them by the House of Commons for a period of two years, after which it becomes law over their heads. The idea of conferences was never popular, and that of a third conference was plainly superfluous. It pre-supposed an equality between the two Houses, which could never be admitted in the case of finance, and the habit of conferences might well have crystallised into a right. This, in its turn, would have conferred the joint voting power existing under some Colonial Constitutions. A small and strictly limited House might conceivably come into some such method of conciliation with the Commons. It would never be conceded to the present House, in face of its claim to root up the representative system from its base. The third change from the form of the Campbell-Bannerman resolution represents a distinct improvement. The earlier scheme confined the power of limiting the Veto of the Lords to the work of a single Parliament. Within the two years preceding a Dissolution of Parliament, measures resisted by the Lords would have to fall still-born. Under the Asquith resolutions the two years' interval between the proposal and the passage of a disputed Bill is retained, but if the country approve the measure, its re-introduction in the New Parliament is certain, and a two years' suspension cannot be enforced against it. To secure a more frequent reference to the will of the people, which is a clear consequence of the restriction of the will of the Lords, the duration of Parliament is to be limited to five years.

What, therefore, is the real body and purpose of the governing system which the resolutions set up? They do not directly touch a Tory House of Commons, save so far as, by strengthening and assuring the counter-stroke of democracy, they tend to make extreme reaction dangerous. For a democratic House of Commons, on the other hand, they do provide a modest run of freedom. Out of a life of five years it will possess just three of full vigor. After that it will pass into a period of minor activity, coupled with a preparation for a renewed lease of fairly unfettered life, and a prospect of handing on to its successors the second harvest of its labors. During the whole of this period, it will be subject to the moral restraint of the Lords, and to its critical assault; that is to say, to the only kind of modifying force compatible with democracy. It will also have to meet the rebuff, and, to some extent, the discredit, of losing a valuable measure for two years, and must reckon on a formidable argument being set up in the country against it. This interval cannot be cut down, as we thought it could be cut down by means of the Campbell-Bannerman resolution, through the device of re-passing rejected Bills in an autumn session. The Lords, therefore, retain the two powers of revision and delay which the Victorian constitutionalists assigned to them as representing their rights in the State, and they gain an earlier and more certain reference to the electors than the present Constitution contemplates. At a not distant date, this state of things may merge into triennial Parliaments. The resolutions therefore imply a certain give-and-take between the two Houses. The House of Commons retains its predominance, but only on condition of accepting a frequent recurrence to the source of its authority. In practice, the pressure which will drive it to the people will come from the House of Lords. These are large concessions, which take us far from Single-Chamber government, and give British democracy only moderate and deliberate powers of advance. If the House of Lords refuse such a Constitution, they will not get such an offer again; and their refusal to treat will stamp them as "out" for a Revolution, based on the subversive act of last November.

Refuse they will; for while they play their electioneering comedy, with the idea that, like children who act, their parts are taken for real, their one substantial proposal is to slip out of the hands of the Crown, to give their body a fixed status and legally assigned numbers, enabling them to claim complete equality with the Commons. If, therefore, the Ministry were really proposing a Single-Chamber system, it could say with perfect truth that it was setting up government by the people, while the Lords proposed to organise government against them. But, in fact, the Ministerial resolutions are Conservatism itself compared with the Rosebery Report. What means have the Government of enforcing them? That of a House of Commons newly arisen from the "Will to Power" of the nation. Who presents that will? The acting Minister. Who executes it? The Crown. "The will of the Crown," says Lord Courtney in "The Working Constitution of the United Kingdom," "is now the will of the Minister, and the Minister is a person possessing the confidence of the House of Commons, which represents the will of the nation. If on rare occasions of transcendent importance the Crown sets aside the will of the Minister, the step is defensible only on the assumption that the Minister no longer represents the national will, and it cannot be taken unless another Minister is found ready to accept the responsibility of a different advice." Who disputes this dictum? It is little more than a summary of older authorities. And yet it lays down the proposition that on occasions of "transcendent importance," like this occasion, the King is bound by the advice of his Ministers, and can only reject it when he thinks that the country is not behind them. But what evidence hostile to the Resolutions could the King possibly collect when he knows, first, that they represent a majority of one hundred or more in the Commons and of some hundreds of thousands in the country, and, secondly, that the Parliament was elected precisely on this issue a few weeks ago? Never was a question put more clearly and authoritatively than that on which the Resolutions are based. And what alternative counsels could Mr. Balfour give? He could not face the House of Commons. He would be thrown out the moment he appealed to it. He could only ask for leave to put the same question to the constituents twice over. Even this stage could not be reached if Lord Courtney correctly interprets his Dicey and Bagehot, for a recent election sets the great central wheel of our governing system going at its top speed, and with its utmost power of grinding corn to make the people's bread.

Here, then, is the true British Constitution which the Resolutions exhibit and enforce, in contrast with the sham Constitution which Revolution-mongers in the Lords are dressing up for the elections. It is most necessary that the whole body of anti-Vetoists in the Commons should support them, whatever be their views of the ultimate form of Parliamentary government in this country; for if they fail, even by a single vote, the presentation to the King and the Lords loses so much authority. The Government is now square with its pledges, as to the form of the attack on the Lords; but the tremendous battle for the full recovery of representative rights is before us, and it should be fought with equal discipline and ardor by each division of the Progressive army.

THE CONSEQUENCE OF THE ASQUITH RESOLUTIONS.

THE first step to clearing the issue has been gained by the presentment of the Asquith resolutions. But stages no less critical are yet to come, and if the fight is to go forward on a clear field, disentangled from all irrelevant controversy, very careful consideration will have to be given to ways and means. It may be assumed that in one form or other the Asquith resolutions will have to be enforced by the judgment of the people. Whether this need necessarily involve a second General Election is not so clear. There is an alternative of which we will speak in a moment. But let us observe first that, an election being a possible contingency, it is above all things necessary that the issue should be unmistakably the Veto and nothing else. It would be the gravest mistake to entangle the question of the Veto with that of the Budget, while, if the Government should be defeated on the Budget or on the preliminary motions necessary to the passage of the Budget, the result could only be the direst confusion. We are not quite sure that either the Government or the Irish Party have given fully adequate consideration to this point. Mr. Redmond is conscious that he has on one or two notable occasions spoken the mind of the British Liberals in this Parliament more fully than their own leaders have done. But he naturally does not envisage the electoral position in Great Britain with their eyes. Their fate, of course, is not his concern, but what is very much his concern is that the Government should be able to put the question of the Veto to the country. This it will not be able to do if it is beaten on the Budget. If it is forced to appeal to the electors by the refusal of the House of Lords to entertain the Veto resolutions or to pass the Veto Bill, then the case will be perfectly clear. The question of the Veto comes to the front of itself. But while the controversy is pending, while the Lords are debating the resolutions on the Bill, the country will expect the Government to proceed with the financial provision for the year. If they fail to do so, they will lose credit. If they are beaten in the attempt to do so, a new issue arises, and the issue of the Veto will fall into the second place. We do not say or think that the Budget need pass through all its stages before the Veto question comes to a head; but we see clearly that if the Government encounter defeat on the preliminaries, the controversy will be closed. A new issue will arise, and the Veto will slumber and sleep. We may, therefore, fairly demand, both of the Government and of the Irish, so much of give and take as will avoid a breach on the question of the Budget, and thus remove the Veto from practical politics.

To carry the Veto Bill against the forces arrayed against it requires, we have admitted, the authority of popular ratification. Does this necessitate a General Election? We think not. The object of the election would be to obtain a direct popular vote on a specific issue. It is a unique issue. It is an issue between the two Houses of Parliament, such as has not arisen since 1832. The Peers have repeatedly appealed to the opinion of the people, for whom they claim to be trustees. Why, in this single and supreme instance, should not the people decide, not by electing a new House of Commons, but by giving a vote, aye or no, upon the Veto Limitation Bill? Such a course, it may be said, is unprecedented, but so is the entire political situation. It was not the House of Commons that began this revolution. It was the House of Lords. That body has put the Government and the House of Commons in an impossible position, and its adherents cannot complain if novel methods are brought into use to deal with the situation. But, it will be said, the practice will become a precedent. The authority of Parliament will be sapped by subjection to the arbitrament of a popular vote, and the Referendum will become a recognised part of our institutions. There is not the smallest reason to suppose any consequence of the kind. An appeal to the people is suggested in this instance, not in the least as something permanently necessary to the working of the Constitution, but as something which will set the old Constitution—resting on the predominance of the House of Commons—on its feet again. That Constitution the Lords overthrew, first by the repeated destruction of Liberal Bills, and finally by the rejection of the Budget. The object of the Veto Bill is to restore the supremacy of the House of Commons, not to override it, to re-establish representation, but not to supersede it. The proposal of an appeal to the people is accordingly being supported by many who are resolutely opposed to anything like a provision for a popular appeal as a part of the regular working machinery of the Constitution. It is put forward, not as a normal constitutional instrument, but as a means of dealing with the present extra-constitutional situation.

If the proposal for direct appeal to the people is dismissed, which we trust will not happen, only one thing remains to be said. If there is to be a General Election the issue this time must be clearly understood. The voter in January believed that in casting his vote for the Government he was helping to bring into existence a Veto Bill, which would be carried through into law by recourse, if necessary, to the creation of peers. At the coming election, if it is to come, he must not merely believe this, he must know it. To go to the country with a vague repetition of the Albert Hall speech would be to meet with stony apathy and indifference on the part of the mass of Liberal electors. Why, they will ask, should they repeat in May the vote they gave in January? What is the difference between the months? Why is a May vote to effect what a January vote failed to achieve? What is the sense of putting the same question to them twice? The Government must not put the same question. They must be in a position to say that they have advised his Majesty that the settlement of the relationship between the two Houses can no longer be postponed; that no Liberal Ministry can take office or continue in office without the means of settling it in their hands; that this means must involve a wholesale creation of peers; that they may have to advise his Majesty that such a creation will be necessary, and that, if such a creation is not made without a second appeal to the country, it is the point on which they would of necessity seek the authority of the electors. If this can be plainly and unmistakably set out before the people, they will, we believe, understand the situation and give the Government the authority which it desires. If it is not made perfectly plain, they will merely resent the turmoil and confusion of a second election of which they will be convinced no good result can come. They will abstain from active interest, and the authority of the Lords will be established, not because the country desires it, but because it despairs of being resolutely led to the final assault. This must not be. The best and safest course is a direct appeal to the verdict of the people on the issue of the Veto, separated from all the entangling controversies of an election. This failing, the single possible alternative is an unambiguous pledge to carry the Veto Bill into law by the method appointed by the Constitution of overcoming the resistance of the Lords.

THE WINDOW-DRESSING OF THE LORDS.

It is a characteristic feat of self-deception that the general tenor of the House of Lords debate should convey the impression that its participants are urged by a genuine and purely spontaneous zeal for reform which happens to approach the plane of actuality just when an utterly unjustifiable assault upon their privileges is threatened. The prominent part taken by such men as Lords Rosebery, Curzon, and Newton, who can point to a past record of reform proposals, serves to give a thin veneer of speciousness to the deception. But it must not be supposed that this feint of voluntary action is designed merely to save their face and to furnish electioneering fodder to the Tory Party for the next appeal to the country. A careless reading of the debates on Lord Rosebery's resolutions might lead to the conclusion that after such a revelation of divergent feelings and notions nothing would be done. But though, doubtless, Lord Halsbury's "stand fast" attitude was inwardly admired by many of his hearers, there was no disposition to adopt it. Why? If Lord Rosebery had brought forward his proposals a year ago, there would have been a strong party of the Lords in favor of rejection or indefinite postponement. But since that time something has happened. The Lords themselves are conscious of sin, though refusing to confess. They know they have committed an outrage upon the Constitution. Not half a dozen would have the effrontery to adopt the amazing plea of Lord Halsbury that "The 25th of Edward I. still stood upon the Statute Book, and was the justification of what the Lords had done." No; amid all the pretence of brazening it out, there is the feeling that they have yielded to a temptation, and that after the fall they must find a fig-leaf to cover their shame.

It must not be forgotten that their evident concern is to defend, not last year's House of Lords, but this year's. Representatives of such various interests and attitudes as Lords Curzon and Cromer, the Marquess of Salisbury, and the Duke of Northumberland, agree in a persistent refusal to consider the abandonment of the Lords' new claims upon control of finance. Their whole attitude towards reform is directed by a stubborn determination to keep intact, if they can, their full right to defeat all legislative proposals which come to them from the Commons. In order to do this, they must be able to give specious support to the contention that in some higher or esoteric sense they are more truly representative of the permanent welfare of the people than is the House of Commons. One or two speakers in the debate rashly vented the phrase "vested interests," but its introduction was felt to be so inappropriate that it was immediately frowned down. Since no one was attacking the Lords or demanding "reform" in a spirit of hostility, it was an evidently artful device to formulate supposititious criticism and then make graceful concessions to meet it. In the spirit of this game, Lord Lansdowne, following the lead of the reforming peers, pretended that the dissatisfaction with the Upper House was not with its powers but with its composition, and that in objecting to its composition it was the promiscuous principle of heredity on the one hand, and the disparity of political parties upon the other hand, that were the objects of censure. The "strength and efficiency" which were so earnestly desired must be interpreted in close relation to this pretended criticism. A House of Lords which is to retain full power over legislation and finance, the right of forcing a General Election when it likes, and of preventing the King from future free exercise of his prerogative of making Peers of Parliament, must, it is felt, be brought into some specious conformity with modern ideas of government.

This involves a curtailment of the purely hereditary composition of the House of Lords, and some infusion of meritorious outsiders whose numbers and mode of entrance shall not be such as to give them any real control. To this Lord Lansdowne accedes, after pouring cold water upon most of the practical proposals for introducing influential representation. "I for one am in favor of a change which shall bring us outwardly and visibly into close touch with the democracy of this country." The words we here italicise carry the whole purpose of the reform proposals. It is window-dressing. "Undesirables" may go, and then we shall have a House of "deserving" peers. "It would put the House in a better position," said the Duke of Walbottle, "to be able to say to the whole world that there were no 'undesirables' there." "It would," urged Lord Rosebery, "have rather a damaging appearance" to maintain that a peer has a "vested right to legislate." In a similar spirit the political leaders dealt with the inequality of parties. Not merely is such great disparity an open scandal, but it offends the sportsmanlike instincts of noble lords. So Lord Lansdowne is prepared to sanction "a well-thought-out and restricted scheme for the purpose of bringing into this House from time to time a number of members who would adequately represent that particular set of political opinions which happened at the time to be inadequately represented in the House as it stood." The mind of the House evidently oscillated between this notion of setting up a rival team to play the great Parliamentary game, and the loftier notion of superior beings with a cross-bench mind, independent, and endowed with a sweet reasonableness and a patriotic detachment.

Lord Crewe pierced this flummery with a sharp thrust of interrogation: "Does this mean that noble lords want victory to be a little more creditable, but desire it to remain equally certain?" It was distinctly clever of the Lords to place in the forefront of the fight the principle of heredity, conscious that they can afford here to make large concessions without impairing the real purpose for which this House exists, viz., to defend the vested interests of landowners, licence-holders, and other economic favorites, against the new popular demands for equality of opportunity and a sound policy of taxation. They are well aware that a reform which would admit by fixed qualification, by nomination, or even by election, a number of outsiders, identified by intellectual sympathy, and probably by business and social connections, with the higher economic stratum, would in the future furnish a stronger barrier of defence to their interests than can be obtained by maintaining intact the present hereditary House. Nay, they have the sense to recognise that a considerable infusion of rich Liberals would, by presenting a show of political equality, cut the claws of radical reformers.

The events of the last twelve months, however, have not only taught the Lords how to defend, they have taught the people what to attack. Nothing will have been gained for popular self-government by merely mutilating or even by eradicating the hereditary principle. The root evil is not there. Any of the lines of reform proposed, or likely to be adopted, would leave the Second Chamber in the control of men whose interests and sympathies will continue to be in conflict upon vital issues of policy with those of the general body of the people. The power of such a House will be utilised to stop the car of progress. A "strong and efficient" House of Lords means a weak and inefficient House of Commons, and an enfeebled, unprogressive people. No sane-sighted Liberal will entertain any proposal to reconstruct the House of Lords until it has been stripped, not only of its recently stolen powers, but of all powers to prevent the popular will expressing itself in acts of government.

THE PUBLIC LAW OF EUROPE.

THE remarkable manifesto on behalf of Finland which has just been issued by a powerful group of European jurists is notable, not merely for what it states, but also for what it assumes. No one will be found, outside the ranks of the Russian bureaucracy and its interested satellites, to question the ruling of a committee so distinguished on a point of law. What Professor Westlake, Sir Edward Fry, and Sir Frederick Pollock among British jurists, with Professors Anschütz von Bar, Lapradelle, and Nys among their Continental colleagues have determined with unanimity may be taken to be a final reading of the public law of Europe. Two of them are members of the Hague Tribunal; a third was lately a member, and all of them exert in their own countries a decisive authority in matters of international right. If the Hague Tribunal could be brought to determine this issue, we can hardly doubt that it would answer the questions put to it by the Finns as these jurists have answered them. Indeed, the moral value of a voluntary opinion such as this is, in some respects, higher than that of a constituted Court. A Court, when once it is seized with a case, must pronounce in honor and conscience upon it. Its members might have preferred to keep silent, and behind their verdict, intellectually honest though we assume it to be, there need be no great weight of feeling or conviction. But a jurist who volunteers an opinion which will certainly irritate Russia, and probably displease the Foreign Office of his own country, presumably feels strongly. The declaration assures us that Finland has a solemn treaty right to the autonomy which she now enjoys, and that the coup d'état which the Russian Government proposes would be a violation of her Constitution. Behind the scientific phrasing of the manifesto, it is fair in all the circumstances to assume that there is an anxious desire to avert a grave wrong.

For how much does such a rendering of abstract right count in the modern world? The forces on the other side are apparent, and they are measurable. There is the fanatical jealousy of anything non-Russian, which has steadily inspired the Russian Court and (somewhat less consistently) the Russian bureaucracy since the Slavophiles first began their work in the 'sixties. More practical is the dread of the example which a free community established within sight of St. Petersburg itself presents to the Russian intellectuals. The police have long been bent on regarding Finland as the centre in which all the plots that they are busied alternately in hatching and detecting have their origin and find their strategic base. There is lastly, and perhaps most potent of all, the desire of the hungrier Russian bureaucrat to have opened to him a province relatively wealthy and populous for spoliation. The destruction of Finnish autonomy means, in short, the satisfaction of characteristic prejudices, the flattering of a reactionary grudge, the simplification of the work of the police, but, above all, it means new careers, fresh promotions, and, in plain words, loot. Against this what avails the verdict of a handful of foreign jurists? The jurists were equally clear in their condemnation of the annexation of Bosnia, and in that case the Powers had a status which they cannot claim in this Finnish question. The contract on which the rights of Finland rest was an instrument which bound only the Tsars and the people of the Duchy. In the mechanics of this problem it is important, however, to remember that the whole position of Russia in Europe rests indirectly on public opinion. To the sedulous goodwill of her ally and her friend she owes the preservation of her status as a Great Power. To the courtesies of monarchs she is indebted as the bulwark which has preserved her from the full impact of a hostile popular judgment. To the nursing of certain financiers she owes her immunity from bankruptcy. From time to time such an episode as the release on bail of Nicholas Tchaykowsky and his ultimate acquittal betrays her sensitiveness to public opinion. Nothing but the knowledge that the Press of England and the United States were interested in him saved him from the fate which has overtaken a score of Social Democratic deputies whose acts and opinions were not more obnoxious to the ruling clique than his. Finland could not disappear from among the free communities of Europe without a sensible addition to the external difficulties which Russia already has to face. The importance of the jurists' protest lies in this, that it assures the lay mind of the plain man who already respects the Finns and desires to see them free, that his instincts and his wishes are no mere matter of sentiment.

It is a morbid appetite which drives a Power incapable of assuring the health of its own body politic to devour the lesser nations within its sphere of influence. There is a certain parallel between the case of Persia and the case of Finland. But if in the one instance it is a hope and a possibility which stands in danger of extinction, in the other it is a splendid and admirable actuality. It is an integral piece of European civilisation which is threatened in this ruin of Finland. It is a people whose windows have always looked to the West, democratic in its institutions as it is Protestant in religion, advanced in its conceptions of social life and duty, in the foremost van in all questions of education and social reform, a pioneer with Norway in the enfranchisement of women. It is painful to read of the degradation which Russian rule has brought to the remote Caucasus. But the peril of Finland is a menace from a half-Oriental despotism to a free Western community. Our sympathy is something more than a platonic sentiment. There is in it an active sense of fraternity. Already the danger is sufficiently real. The autonomous institutions of Finland are suspended. Its administration, under a notably reactionary Governor, assisted by officials drawn for the most part from the army and the navy, is already more Russian than Finnish. The central Government has claimed and exercised a power of veto of legislation which paralyses the whole work of self-government. But the final act of usurpation is still delayed. We know that, under the pretext of providing for the regulation of interests common to the Duchy and the Empire, M. Stolypin proposes to invest the Duma, in which four Finnish members are henceforth to sit, with the power to legislate for Finland. The questions with which it will be competent to deal include the whole range of government, and it would be difficult to mention a single important function of a modern State which will be reserved for the Finnish Diet. When the autonomy of Ireland was destroyed, at least the consent of the Irish Parliament was purchased by bribes and honors. But it is not proposed in the case of Finland to have recourse even to that formality. The blow, when it falls, will be a stroke of superior force which stoops to no disguises. Finland, if M. Stolypin adheres to his programme, will be rased, and that without so much as a show of negotiation, from the status of a nation, to which it was raised by the solemn oath of the Tsar Alexander I. For our part we are reluctant to admit that this country lacks the means to prevent so gross a violation of the public law of Europe. We have no status for any formal or official intervention. But this at least we can command—that from the day when this wrong is consummated no voice which claims to speak from British public opinion shall venture to talk of any intimacy, of any friendship, between ourselves and the Russian autocracy without the certainty of a sharp disclaimer and a general repudiation. Whatever be our official relations, no entente cordiale has yet been consummated. It shall not and cannot be concluded unless the liberties of Finland are respected.

THE CONFUSION OF AMERICAN POLITICS.

AFTER a year in the White House President Taft might well sympathise with Danton's despairing plea of pity for those who "meddle in the government of men." Wherever he turns he sees nothing but dissension and revolt, a dissatisfied nation and a distracted party. Twelve months ago he entered on his office amid some at least of the omens of a successful reign. He was popular both with the people and the party leaders; he had just received the largest majority ever accorded to a Presidential candidate; after the boisterous days of the Rooseveltian epoch it looked as though an era of good feeling, and of steady, unspectacular achievement were about to set in. Every one of these anticipations has been falsified. The Republicans are more torn by strife to-day than at any moment since the Civil War; the President, if he has maintained his personal popularity intact, has somehow got out of touch with the country, and has forfeited its confidence not in his intentions but in his methods; there is no clear sign of leadership anywhere; the Statute-book has received but one addition—and that one the Payne Tariff Act, a measure almost universally execrated; and the prospect of a Democratic victory at the Congressional elections next November is far more imminent than the prospect that Mr. Taft will pass an item of his programme into law. Many forces and factors have combined to produce what is hardly less than a deadlock. Mr. Taft suffers by comparison with the dramatic personality and showy tactics of his predecessor. He is unable to cow the Conservative leaders of his party, as Mr. Roosevelt cowed them, by vivid, irresistible appeals to popular sentiment; and the methods of persuasion which he prefers were proved by the history of the Payne Tariff Act to be wholly inadequate to overcome the resistance of the Reactionaries. He suffers still more from the infection into American politics of issues that correspond with none of the normal lines of party division, and that attract men or repel them with little regard for affiliations and catch-words that are fast becoming meaningless.

These new and disruptive issues have been brought into being by the struggle of the American people to free themselves from the grip of plutocracy and privilege. "How are we to curb the money-power, to bring the great industrial corporations under the control of the Government, to master the railways before they master us, to rescue politics from the domination of organised wealth, to preserve the natural resources of the country from reckless exploitation by the speculator, to make the common welfare and not the convenience or the cupidity of special interests the motive-power of legislation?" Those are the questions that Americans are asking themselves; and it is Mr. Roosevelt's one contribution to the moral and social progress of his country that he should have raised them. If he did nothing else, he tried to educate his fellow-citizens to see that the public interest is something beyond the sum total of private interests. The policies he formulated set up the nation and its welfare as the supreme object of public endeavor; but when he tried to translate them into Acts of Congress he was met, first, by the intricacies and limitations of the Constitution, and the weakness of the American form of government for positive action; and, secondly, by the fact that his proposals fitted in with none of the usual party formulæ. The same difficulties face Mr. Taft. There are Conservative Republicans and Radical Republicans, Conservative Democrats and Radical Democrats. The Conservatives in each party oppose, and the Radicals in each party favor, the "Roosevelt policies" which Mr. Taft tries laboriously but ineffectively to forward. But as it is the Conservatives who are in control of the Republican Party both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, and as Mr. Taft lacks the qualities that might drive them into submission, and intends, indeed, to act with them and not against them, his progress so far has been trifling.

The situation here sketched almost explains by itself the activities of the "insurgents" in the Senate and the overthrow last Saturday of "Cannonism" in the House. The "insurgents" are a group of enthusiastic Senators, mainly from the Middle West, who are whole-hearted subscribers to the Roosevelt policies, who believe that Mr. Taft is sacrificing them without quite realising it, and who were revolted by the shameless barter of the common welfare to special interests revealed by the Payne Tariff Act. They are wholly sceptical of any good results from Mr. Taft's policy of seeking to coax the Conservatives into accepting measures they abhor. The President, therefore, finds himself politically allied with the men whose general attitude towards politics he most dislikes, and politically alienated from the men who, like himself, chiefly desire to write the Roosevelt policies on the Statute Book. He supports the Conservatives with whom he disagrees because they are the official and recognised leaders of the party, and to quarrel with them is to destroy his last chance of getting anything done. He reprimands the Radicals for their lack of party loyalty, although he and they have the same goal. The country, meanwhile, fails to understand the situation or to grasp what Mr. Taft is driving at, and the Party revolves in a whirlpool of uncertainty and recrimination.

Life and Letters.

"THE RELIGIOUS LIFE."

"It is as different," wrote Teresa, "teaching girls and managing a great number of them together, from teaching boys, as white is from black. I have experience of what many women together are like. God deliver us." In England still the conventual life is something foreign, exotic; maintained by a Church which has been for three centuries an alien and a mystery. Men and women gaze at the high walls or distant roofs of monastery or convent, wonder what kind of existence is carried on there; a natural expectation of some high degree of sanctity clashes with a traditional and hereditary distrust of monasticism. In France and Italy the convent life is dead; in other countries, Ireland, Spain, Southern Germany, it is part of the normal machinery of civilisation, the subject of little curiosity or disquietude. A certain percentage of the female population finds a vocation in one of the very various forms of common or ascetic life as naturally as another percentage finds a vocation in matrimony. Both are life-long obligations, both involve considerable risk, at an early age, of making a wrong choice; in both a wrong choice means an enduring calamity. Both also, if all the truth were known, offer every variation of happiness, of misery, and of what is more general, of variations in happiness and misery. Occasional volumes of protest, by those who have found the communal and religious life intolerable, reveal the old difficulty of Teresa. Occasional experiences, voiced in modern playwright or novelist, give expression to the dull wretchedness, of man and woman once happily married, in many respectable suburban dwellings. In any case the modern indifferent civilisation has still to solve the problem which in religious countries is partly met by the conventual system. There is not yet offered to the unmarried daughters of a poorish household any life of dignity, service, and contentment. The nightmare vision of Mr. Huxtable's household at Denmark Hill in the "Madras House," with the six unmarried daughters aging visibly into a community of timid, quarrelsome old maids, suggests that the present system may not, after all, be the final word in the matter.

Two little books—a protest and what is in fact, if not in name, an answer—reveal the two extremes of the picture—the supreme satisfaction of the "religious" life when the vocation is present, the dreary torture of it when this is lacking. "The Escaped Nun," by Margaret Moulton (Cassell and Co.), gives the experience, presented in very naïve and simple form, of a lady whose departure from a convent at East Bergholt caused some sensation—amongst those interested in such matters—a few months ago. The "escape" was of the simplest, consisting in walking out of an open gate and taking the train to London. But the story of life in an enclosed convent, if written with a certain tinge of bitterness, shows only too clearly the difficulty of "many women together" where the inspiration is absent. From the first moment the novice revolted against rule and discipline. "I was not accustomed to being told when to go to the church, when to go for a walk, what to eat and when." She complains of the food, finding even a grievance in the fact that the nuns are compelled to eat foreign, instead of English meat: she complains of the clothes—rough, heavy, uncomfortable: she complains of the "laboriousness and monotony of the day." The little trivial discomforts are always on the surface and tear the nerves to pieces. The Abbess visits the cells unexpectedly. "It was really very annoying to find that your cell had been turned upside down in your absence by the Superior. One never knew when to expect her." She complains that "a postulant must be ready for all kinds of manual labour." The promotion of another novice before her fills her with a kind of hysteric anger—"I had endured so much, but the thought of having to give up my rank never occurred to me." "For many and many a month bitterness rose in my heart hourly, reminded as I was at every step that I had lost my rank, which even the Rule insists that the monks should have." A chief grievance is the arrival of a new Abbess, who has a new laid egg for tea while the nuns eat bread and butter. So the confession continues—very human, very pitiful, with no particular "revelations" but the impossibility of the convent life to one still desperately concerned with food and decoration and "rank" and comfort, and all the trivial, friendly, aimless things which make up the daily existence of man and woman in the world.

"The Life of an Enclosed Nun," by a Mother Superior (Fifield), shows the other side of the picture. If the first volume exhibits the Spanish convent as Teresa found it, the second exhibits it when she had completed her labors. "It is difficult to think that seculars pity us, instead of envying us," this nun declares. "Yet I can understand that to be a professed nun and not to have a vocation would be too terrible to be borne: the only thing to do would be to secure a dispensation and retire." But with the vocation for the life of contemplation—as mysterious, as much a special gift as artistic genius, as love between man and maid—here is the opportunity through which the soul can mount into regions beyond: "To be always recollected, to be purged of all desire, to reach 'Das nichts'—the divine Dark." The very elements which seem so distasteful to the spirit still primarily concerned with kindness and comfort, are the elements which to those who can follow "that undaunted daughter of Desires" are most acceptable. Obedience becomes an act of welcome, menial occupations, rude manual labor, spare, coarse food, things themselves desirable. St. Francis taught his brethren most chiefly to rejoice when they were subject to insults and abuse, or when the result of their collection from the charitable gave only the hardest crusts and most forbidding fare. To this Mother Superior the convent life is the way of Escape: the rule and bodily discipline through which the soul may be launched in exploration of a universe of amazing attraction. So, indeed, in all climes and centuries, this demand has been satisfied: in the Buddhist monks of Burmah, through all the ardors and aspirations of the Middle Ages, down even to the heart of a civilisation when comfort and security have offered a more certain counter appeal. In the case of this confession, the demand for solitude is more insistent than that for companionship. It is the life of the daily round, the conversation, the business of management, the incidents which in the enclosed life most resemble the life outside, which are the severest trial. So it has been with all the mystics: in many of whom—notably Teresa herself—humor, common sense, and great capacity for organisation have accompanied this great hunger of the soul for complete separation. No one of them has ever been able to describe it, except in metaphor confessed as altogether inadequate. With some it is a demand for Great Light, with others for Great Darkness—Vaughan's "night where I in Him might live invisible and dim." With Jacopone it was thirst for the "End in Good unimagined and measureless light"; with Du Bellay, exaltation in "le grandeur du Rien" and the passage of "le grand tout" itself into nothingness. Augustine sought it in "the Quiet that lies beneath all the noises of the world." But the metaphor most generally used is of fire: that consuming flame which forms the final step in the ascent of contemplation, the consummation of the "Via Mystica." The demand for it is hidden amongst all humanity, and every man of genius is at heart something of a mystic. Stevenson in the Cevennes, sojourns for the night in "the monastery of Our Lady of the Snows," Burne-Jones cherishes for forty years the memory of the Carthusian monastery in Charlton forest, Carlyle demands throughout his tempestuous voyages, for "a time that shall be always calm weather," in "such a rest as God's holy will has appointed and as no man knows." In the Catholic convent the desire appears as the historic prayer, "May the Lord kindle in us the fire of His love, and the flame of everlasting charity": in the meditation which leads up from the "house and those therein," through other worlds and universes, to God the Maker and the End of all. In such an enterprise "the real life of the nun," this Mother Superior has a right to claim, "is the inner life: the outer life is merely a routine the body learns to go through mechanically, and is of no importance. Progress in the spiritual life is our aim, and our goal is union with God."

The future of the conventual life, in a world becoming ever more rational and ease-loving, has often formed a subject of conjecture. It has been the centre from which the strongest have gone forth for the conquest of the world. It has been the refuge to which the weakest have fled from a world which has proved unendurable; the home of broken things. And it has been the shelter from which, in no active philanthropies, but as a place of detachment from irrelevant confusions, the Soul has set itself to voyage through the material universe to other regions beyond. The world is tolerant of the philanthropies, and recognises the desirability of a refuge; it is intolerant or mildly incredulous of these adventures of the spirit. It would like to construct something of the nature of a common life for women, who, by choice or compulsion, remain single, in which active assistance in nursing, education, or kindness to the poor may provide the connecting bond formerly provided by religious exercises and austerities. The experiment will be doubtfully successful. Teresa's experiences of "what many women together are like" apart from such a discipline are not encouraging. James Mill, in the early sanguine days of the nineteenth century, propounded a complete scheme of Church Reform. It was to abolish the articles, constitute a Church without dogmas or ceremonies, employ the clergy to give lectures on ethics, botany, political economy, "besides holding Sunday meetings, dances (decent dances are to be specially invented for the purpose), and social meals, which would be a revival of the 'agapai' of the early Christians. For this purpose, however, it might be necessary to substitute tea and coffee for bread and wine." This does not seem to promise that, as the conventual life dies gradually away, as for a number of reasons it is, we think, bound to die—possibly without the final regrets even of the Roman Church—any very powerful successor will be found for it.

BODY AND SOUL.

If we were suddenly told to think of the interval between the first and second Samnite wars, most of us, whether we were still at school or had long left it, would have but a misty and uninteresting idea. We should connect the subject only with lessons, usually uninteresting and misty things, and the familiar names would suggest to us nothing but hurried readings after football, hurried questions, and an imposition. That is the worst of education. Knowledge must form part of it, no matter how small a part, and the knowledge must be of the best. Yet the teaching of the best commonly brings it into disrepute, and what a boy has learnt at school may appear to him useless and tedious up to his life's end, unless the knowledge of it bestows a social distinction. But for the familiarity of casual or arduous training, with what excitement and admiration a grown man, who had known minds and camps and cities, would read Herodotus or Cæsar or the Greek tragedies! No other literature would appear to him comparable to that, either for importance or perfection. Then, indeed, new worlds would enter into his vision, new stars and oceans. He would stand silent like Keats with Chapman's Homer open before him. But Keats never had to do the Iliad by forty lines at a time, when he wanted to go on the river or to get home to his white mice.

So when Mr. Arthur Gilkes, headmaster of Dulwich, publishes through Messrs. Simcox of Dulwich an account of life in Italy during an interval in the Samnite wars, and tells us that one act of a great tragedy in the history of the world was then being developed in the Italian peninsula, we are likely to remain indifferent. For our memories of Samnites are dreary or unpleasant, and we would gladly let the bones of the Romans and their enemies rest together in eternal peace. But when he goes on to tell us that "history presents many tragedies of the kind, many as complete and many more sudden, but none in which the issues at stake were more important to the world at large, and the nations acting were more interesting," then we are roused in spite of ourselves. We begin to look at things with minds alert, no longer benumbed by school association, and we see that the theme of the drama then being enacted was indeed "the removal of the foremost nation in the world from its place." It was the Greek nation that was being thus removed—in Italy by the growing power of savage little Rome, whom Greeks despised, and it is in Italy that Mr. Gilkes sets the scene of his significant episode in that long tragedy. But if we had not learnt our meagre history in separate compartments, we might also remember that in the very year he chooses for his story, the Macedonian at Chæronea destroyed the freedom of the Greek peoples in their proper home.

The four sons who in the book come into touch with each other during this crisis of a world's tragedy are a Greek, a Macedonian, a Roman, and a Jew—types of men representing the forces of mind, conduct, and religion already in sharp contact around the Mediterranean. Their story is told with the Greek irony, the restraint, and stubborn rejection of artifice habitual in the author's works. The compressed style, half Spartan, half Socratic, is rather Greek than English, and may have passed through the writer's mind first in Greek form, except where the narrative is military, and then the language is Roman. But just as from silent Spartans we have received the most memorable sentences of Greek conversation, so a bareness and brevity of expression here strengthen the irony and point. Speaking, for instance, of the Greek nation, the writer says, "The tonic of danger had come to it too late," and leaves the matter there. So when a Macedonian heard a woman express an opinion upon an important subject, he turned towards her, we are told, "as much astonished as if a quadruped had spoken." Or, again, we are told with simplicity that "it is an unpleasant thing for a commander when his troops are unwilling to face the enemy"; and of a Jew it is said, "In the management of this business Elias found himself cursed in the Psalms which he read or sung in his daily devotions." Or, as a last example of many possible, we may take the sentence:—

"It is a sight which impresses a man at any time to see an orderly body of 1,200 men or more, but when that body is an army moving upon the town in which he lives—in order to occupy it—the sight is so impressive as to be painful."

But it is not for the attraction of an ironic style, trained to lean and bony fitness, that we draw attention to the book; nor even for its vivid picture of that strange crisis in history and the lasting significance of the result. We do not know how it comes—perhaps it comes from the habit of a man who has always dealt with many and various natures, and has judged them rapidly—but all through the book we feel a peculiar sense of the intimate connection between body and soul. Probably it is unconscious in the writer—a matter of habit, as we said, from the need of divining character or intellect quickly, and often from the outward appearance, which betrays signs of danger or advantage that most of us ignore. But the careful descriptions of the people who appear in the story prove that the thought is not accidental; and perhaps the illustrations of the book prove the same, for, without exception, they are heads from statues chosen to represent the characters. There are many fine touches of insight into the mind besides: of one man we are told he was "always self-conscious, and thus inclined to be sulky"; of another, that he displayed "the courteous and liberal curiosity of a man who knows he has a fine past behind him"; and of a heavy Roman general who prided himself on his wit, that "he began to be funny every evening." But these observations are nearly always accompanied by some physical trait, some visible sign of an inward quality that may be grace or may be its opposite. "When I see you," says a Greek, speaking of someone's future, "you will be spare and hard and only a Roman, having been born a man."

Once, indeed, this tendency of the writer is consciously expressed, and in characteristic sentences:—

"Everything helps to mould character," he writes in his Greek manner, "little things as well as big things; not only heredity and teachers and great events, but little things such as short trousers or silver forks, or little bodily conditions such as a distorted nail or a crooked nose, or a high instep or a curl. These, by the constancy with which they either chasten or please their owners, do as much as anything to make each man what he is. It is here that the permanence of the body, as it is asserted in the doctrine of its resurrection, is revealed."

We all know from long custom how much the soul influences the body. We know that in the rough we can estimate a man fairly well by his shape and face; we can tell whether a man "looks nice," or is "nice-looking," as we say, though with a shade of difference in meaning. If we analyse, we can speak of a weak chin or a strong jaw, shifty eyes, and a bitter mouth. We know that a heavy ear means a Conservative, that unruly or upright hair means a revolutionist or impatient idealist, that a thick neck reveals power and, perhaps, cruelty, that a pale face may be torpid, and a red face useless in debate. And so as to noses, we join Socrates in calling the straight nose serious and the tip-tilted nose charming or merry. "You may know a man by his gait," said the Preacher, and there is no mistaking the slouch of the book-worm, the politician's stoop, as though the neck were over-burdened with the mighty brain, or the threatening uprightness of a Territorial. The various degrees of fatness and thinness imply greater diversities of soul than we have time to consider. We need only say that, though the poet tells us both Falstaff and Hamlet were fat, we know instinctively that one statement is necessarily true, and the other a misprint.

These rough judgments are but the armory of daily life. By them we have learnt to protect ourselves more or less against the perils of our fellow men, just as a mother bird cowers under a hawk's hovering wings, but lets the flapping heron pass. We have learnt that the body is from birth the expression of the soul, and that, as years go by, the soul writes on it a longer and plainer story. But Mr. Gilkes goes further still in the connection of the two. He turns the matter round, and shows us the body reacting upon the soul; and this observation is rarer and more serious. He first takes things connected with the body, but not actually part of it, such as short trousers and silver forks, one tending to abase the soul, the other to upraise it. What school-boy's soul has not been chastened or warped by short trousers or their equivalent? The present writer used to tuck his short trousers into his socks under the pretence that all trousers were more becoming so. He remembers another boy, now a light to the Church, who as far as possible always walked with his left side close against a wall in the hope of concealing a parti-colored patch. Into the souls of both those things have entered, either to chasten or to warp. As to silver forks, their effect for good or evil can be studied in the souls of the House of Lords.

But more intimate still is the influence of the body's own defects or qualities—the little bodily conditions of which the author speaks, such as a distorted nail or a crooked nose, or a high instep, or a curl. Here again we have reasons either for abasement or for pride. To some families a high instep is a more vital evidence of superiority than a silver fork. We have known a boy prouder of a curl than of winning a race; and as to Belinda, when the meeting points dis severed the sacred hair from her fair head, we know what screams of horror rent the affrighted skies:—

When husbands or when lapdogs breathe their last."

So much for the causes of pride; but in regard to defects, the result upon the soul is more difficult to estimate. We should expect from them a lowliness and humility of spirit, but we are sometimes disappointed. Pope was not humble, nor was Quasimodo tame. His deformed foot did not make Byron lowlier than ordinary men; if possible, it made him more conceited than they; and to Cyrano his obtrusive nose was a cause of romantic glory. A bodily defect seems likely to promote aggressive self-consciousness rather than a reasonable humility, and that is, perhaps, the real motive that sets us on our guard at sight of it. The constancy with which it chastises its owner has not always the effect that we feel chastisement ought to have; otherwise, we should, of course, welcome it in other people wherever it appeared.

It would be of interest to follow the subject further—to discover, for instance, what is the effect on the soul when a cause of bodily pride is removed; what change was noticed in Belinda when her lock was gone; whether a man advances or deteriorates when both his family insteps are carried away by a cannon shot. But now we have merely dwelt for a moment upon this strange intimacy between the body and its guest, revealing, as Mr. Gilkes says, the permanence of the body, if we must also assume the permanence of the soul. In the Philosopher's famous prayer to Pan, he concludes with the words, "May the outward and the inward man be at one." It is a beautiful petition, but perhaps unnecessary, since it is invariably granted.

WILD GREENHOUSES.

THESE howling winds of March are a peremptory veto on the twelve daisies under one foot that make a spring. You can almost see the grasses shrink as the sun goes in and the rasp of the wind is drawn across the field, wilting adventurous heads that stand more than an inch out of the herbage. If worse is possible, it is when great gouts of hail or rain, icily white, come thudding down. The very rooks now nesting in the vicarage elms are buffeted up and down in the wind till they battle behind the larch wood and leave the scene to entire desolation.

But it needs only a few tree trunks to shut out the devastating wind and make a haven of peace within the wood. The sun may enter but the wind may not. The birds that have been driven from the field are here, quietly foraging in the dead leaves of last year. The leaves of the year to come are striking out boldly in many a favored spot where a holly bush weaves an extra screen, or a dip in the ground makes a basin of sunshine which no wind can stir. The honeysuckle puts out its leaves here, though in the hedges of the field it has the prudence of the other trees. The elder is becoming so well furnished that, unsatisfactory as its boughs are, the birds are taking more than a passing look at it as a place for a nest. In our southern country a nest is seldom actually placed among the straight and brittle twigs of the elder. Before the instinct becomes overwhelming, some other tree offers hospitality. But further north you will find almost all the early chaffinches weaving their homesteads in this unaccommodating but early leafing tree.

Our woodland hawthorn has sprouted so far that we can break off the tips of green and eat them as "bread and cheese," as we learned to do soon after we learned to walk. Where the accidental collaboration of man has happened, one of Nature's greenhouses has done more wonderfully yet. A manure heap has caught a spray of the hedge and has forced it so effectively that we can count the blossoms of May upon it, and, opening the petals, can see the black and red stamens that will so sweeten the air on the other twigs two months hence. But come on into the wood and revisit the old greenhouses where the first blossoms have been found for the last twenty years.

This southern slope of many acres is ablaze with the green fire of setter-wort, our native Christmas rose, which has been coming into flower since the turn of the year. The spurge laurel, too, is crowded with blossom under its crown. It was so when the frost fringed its glossy leaves with woolly crystals, and it is equally precocious in the open and in the sheltered parts of the wood. It is in the sudden notch beyond, where a plantation of spruce cuts off the attentions of the north wind, that we find our early primroses. They are rooted in the rich decay of oak and beech, and are threatened into early rising by the boughs overhead, whose leaves will allow no flowers to blossom when they are fully come. But the army of primroses which star these banks in April will be in good time enough to get all the sky they want. There can be no benefit to reward the primrose that comes in early March before the bees and butterflies are awake or even the little beetles that swarm after primrose pollen have hatched from the cold earth. These pale blossoms peeping rarely through the old leaves are surely destined of all their race to leave no progeny. Yet year after year they are forced in Nature's greenhouses to speak of spring long before spring is a reality. So it is with many other enthusiasts. The early white dead nettle, the out-of-season daisy, the winter red campion are certain to die childless if not to lose the stock also as penalty of their wakefulness, yet always there are a few individuals to wave their flags months out of time.

We have greenhouses within greenhouses. A breaking up of the floor bids us lift up a wad of the felt under which all is green with the tender clover-like leaves of the wood sorrel. The gardener cannot construct a better forcing-cover than these millions of leaves laid carefully one over the other, yielding to the gentle push of young growth and always good to keep out the few degrees of frost that filter into the wood. The bluebells have thrust their spears through in every direction, and the curious man who takes off a square yard of the cover will find the white shoots of many a summer flower. Wood pigeons and badgers, to mention only two of a great army, know how to uncover their special dainties, such as "wood-anemone seakale" and bluebell bulbs, and make nourishing and purifying spring salads of them. Feast how they may, yet the milky-way of anemone blossom will not seem to have one vacancy when April comes.

The conditions that make for early blossom are not all typified in wind-breaks of trees and sheltering dips in the ground. Even a foot-deep carpet of dead leaves will not act as a forcing-bed if it lies on a waterlogged soil. A bed of leaves and leaf mould, with sharp drainage beneath, will give us early primroses, even despite the east wind. The cold rain goes easily down, and then, from the warm depths, water reascends in minute aerated fragments by capillary attraction. Leaf mould upon Tunbridge Wells sand seems to be the most favorable conjunction in this country, and it is more to account for the out-of-season flowers of Sussex than the degree of south latitude that separates it from Middlesex. The sunny hour that comes now and then in a long stretch of rain finds the well-drained root ready to respond almost at a moment's warning. A little of the starch is stirred and converted towards cellulose. If rain or cold check its continuance, they cannot revoke it. The bulb is one notch ahead of its brother in the clay and ready to take another notch at the first opportunity, however short. It is thus that, the day after the snow has gone, a few hours' sun can paint a mountainside with wide open crocus, soldanelle, and gentian.

The furrows in the ploughed field are appreciably better sheltered than the tops of the "lands." But it is on the tops that we find our only blossoms of veronica and pimpernel. The tops in the meadow will be yellow with cowslips before the furrows are yellow with buttercups and when the purple orchis has faded from the ridge, then we can find the late stragglers in the trough. The little mounds on the common that were put there by last year's moles or last summer's ants are specially covered with evergreen cistus or the tiny promise of thyme and marjoram. Bosses of the same will greet our footsteps on the flat when summer really comes, but we can find little trace of them now. According to some, the ant-hill ought to be more forward than the mole-hills because formic acid is a great accelerator of growth. It is said to enter into the formula by means of which Indian jugglers produce a bush in a few minutes from seed. That is fanciful, but we intend some day to put formic acid to a careful test as a quickener of growth. Certainly the ant-hills become quickly covered with vegetation, the grass blades keeping pace with the labors of the ants to cover them, and new things rooting and growing there again. It would not be probable that the principle would retain its properties through the winter, and the ant-hills are only early by virtue of their elevation and perhaps of their hollowness.

Oddly enough, some of Nature's best greenhouses are under water. The hornwort, water buttercup, and other pond weeds are green and pushing long before the clover has sprouted. Perhaps the water forms a lens for the concentration of the sun's best rays just as the glass of the greenhouse does. It may be difficult to think of water weeds as feeling warm and dry before that state of happiness comes to the land things, but the spring condition of each of them is comparative. The air and the earth warmed by the day's sun relapse at night far more readily than the water does. Ten degrees on the field may be lost in a night, while one degree in the pond is still there the next morning and ready to take to it another while the field is warming up to yesterday's heat. And the water plants have no cumbrous machinery of root and root fibre to get under weigh before they can grow. They grow entirely through their leaves and stalks, which are spread in a far more stable atmosphere than the air. They are more in the sun and less in the wind than the reeds are, and the pond will be covered with white stars before the reeds have begun to shoot.

Present-Day Problems.

"GENTLES, LET US REST!" *

IF, then, women's position is inferior to men's; if the essential reason of this inferiority is her weakness, or, in other words, the still unchecked dominance of force, to what extent do the facts and figures of the movement towards removing the inferiority of woman's position warrant the conclusion that the idea of the full emancipation of women is, not withering and dying, but holding fast and spreading?

In 1866, a petition for the vote, signed by 1,499 women, was presented to Parliament by John Stuart Mill.

In 1873, petitions for the suffrage from 11,000 women were presented to Gladstone and Disraeli.

In 1896, an appeal was made to members of Parliament by 257,000 women of all classes and parties.

In 1897, 1,285 petitions in favor of a Women's Suffrage Bill were presented to Parliament, being 800 more petitions than those presented in favor of any other Bill.

In 1867, Mill's amendment to substitute "person" for "man" in the Representation of the People Act was rejected by a majority of 121.

In 1908, Stanger's Bill to enable women to vote on the same terms as men passed its second reading by a majority of 179.

In 1893, 1894, and 1895, the franchise was granted to women in New Zealand, Colorado, South Australia, and Utah.

In 1900, 1902, 1903, 1905, and 1908, the franchise was granted to women in Western Australia, New South Wales, Tasmania, Finland, Norway, and Victoria.

In 1906, a petition was signed by 1,530 women graduates.

In 1908, a procession of over 10,000 women marched from the Embankment to the Albert Hall.

In 1910, the membership of the various Women's Suffrage Societies, and of bodies of men and women who have declared in favor of the idea of women's suffrage, is estimated by some at over half a million—a figure subject, no doubt, to great deduction; but certainly also to great addition for sympathisers who belong to no such societies or bodies.

These, very briefly, are the main facts and figures. From them but one conclusion can be drawn. The idea of the full emancipation of women having fulfilled the requirements of steady growth, is in accord with the principle of Equity; intrinsically gentle, intrinsically just. How long will it remain possible in the service of expediency and force to refuse to this idea its complete fruition; how long will it be wise? For when the limit of wisdom is reached, expediency has become inexpedient, and force futile. Has that limit been reached?

When out of six hundred and seventy members of a House of Commons four hundred have given pledges to support women's suffrage; when a measure for the enfranchisement of women on the same terms as men has passed its second reading by a majority of one hundred and seventy-nine, and in face of this declaration of sentiment Government has refused to accord facilities for carrying it into law, there must obviously be some definite hostile factor in the political equation. That factor is party expediency. In a country governed as ours is, it is but natural that those who are, heart and soul, bound up with one party or the other, who are, so to speak, trustees for its policy, should not look with favor on any measure which may in their opinion definitely set back that policy, or affect it in some way which they cannot with sufficient clearness foresee. The cause of women is a lost dog owned by neither party, distrusted by both. While there is yet danger of being bitten, each watches that dog carefully, holding out a friendly hand. But when the door of the house is safely closed, she may howl her heart out in the cold. The Press, too, with few exceptions, is committed to one or other of these parties. To the Press, also, then, the cause of women is a homeless wanderer to whom it is proper to give casual alms, but who can hardly be brought in to the fire, lest she take up the room of the children of the house. And so out of the despair caused by this lost drifting in a vicious circle; out of a position created by party expediency, the inevitable has come to pass. Militant suffragism has arisen—ironically, since the real spiritual significance and true national benefit of the full emancipation of women will lie in the victory of justice over force; and to employ force to achieve the victory of justice over force, is both strangely paradoxical, and so befogging to the whole matter that the essential issue of Equity is more than ever hidden from the mind of the public. Militancy has served the purpose of advertisement, but it has added one more element of fixity to an impasse already existing, for the woman of action is saying: "Until you give me the vote I shall act like this;" and the man of action is answering her: "So long as you act like that I shall not give you the vote. To yield to you now would be to admit the efficacy of violence, and establish a bad precedent. If I give way to a demand voiced by such methods I shall be accused of weakness."

We must look at the situation, therefore, not as it was, or might be, but as it is, and will be, whatever temporary truces may be arranged. We must consider what effect that situation is having on the national character. Every little outrage committed on men by women, is met by a little outrage committed on women by men; and each time one of these mutual outrages takes place, tens of thousands of minds in this country are blunted in that most sensitive quality, gentleness. It is idle to pretend that women have not stood, and do not still stand, to men as the chief reason for being gentle; that men have not, and do not still stand to women, in the same capacity. By every little mutual outrage, then, the beneficence of sex is being weakened, its maleficence awakened, throughout the land. And the harm which is thus being done is so impalpable, so subtle, as to be beyond the power of most to notice at all, and surely beyond the power of statesmen to assess. That is the mischief. The scent is stealing away out of the flower of our urbanity. It will be long before the gardeners discover how odorless and arid that flower has become. "Very well, then!" it may be said; "Let these women cease! They began it!" Did they begin it? Was not their action as inevitable an outcome of men's indifference and opposition as ever was flame rising from a smouldering fire when a cold wind blows? What else could be expected of the women of this country? What would you have but high spirit? However regrettable this militancy, and the impasse which it is fortifying, however usual it may be to think of such conduct as hysterical, whatever element of truth there be in that charge, we may still thank Heaven that there are so many women amongst us who are ready and eager to undergo humiliation and suffering for the sake of an idea.

But it is not so much the action of the militant women themselves, nor that of those who are suppressing them, which is doing this subtle harm. It is the effect of this scrimmage on the spectators; the coarsening, and hardening, and general embitterment; the secret glorification of the worst side of the sex instinct; the constant exaltation of the rule of force; the rapid growth of a rankling sense of injustice amongst tens of thousands of women. To say that hundreds of thousands of women are opposed, or indifferent, to the full emancipation of their sex, is not, in truth, to say much. No civilising movement was ever brought to fruition save in the face of the indifference or opposition of the majority. What proportion of agricultural laborers were concerned to win for themselves the vote? How small a fraction of the people actively demanded free education! But when these privileges were won, what number of those for whom they were won would have been willing to resign them? If women were fully emancipated to-morrow, numbers would surely resent what they would deem a blow at the influence and power already wielded by them in virtue of their sex. But in two years' time how many would be willing to surrender their freedom? As surely, not one in a hundred! To compare the disapproval of women raised against their wills to a state of emancipation in which they can remain inactive if they like, with the bitter resentment spreading like slow poison in the veins of those who fruitlessly demand emancipation, is to compare the energy of vanishing winter snow with that of the spring sun which melts it.

In an age when spirituality has ever a more desperate struggle to maintain hold at all against the inroads of materialism, any increase of bitterness in the national life, any loss of gentleness, aspiration, and mutual trust between the sexes, however silent, secret, and unmeasurable, is a very serious thing. Justice, neglected, works her own insidious revenge. There is an impasse. It will be easy to prolong that impasse indefinitely. It will be easy to go on saying: "Your cause is not our cause; we can't help you!" To go on shouting: "Behave yourselves, if you want us to do something!" But every month, every year, the germs of bitterness and brutality will be spreading. If any think that this people has gentleness to spare, and can afford to tamper with the health of its spirit, they are mistaken. If any think that repression can put an end to this impasse—again they are mistaken. The idea of the full emancipation of women is so rooted that nothing can now uproot it, and while human nature is human nature, there must ever be a vanguard of hot spirits surpassing in their actions the measures of the moderate majority. Has not expediency, then, become inexpedient, and force futile?

But apart from the political impasse, there are those who, satisfied that women have not the political aptitude of men, are chiefly opposed to the granting of the vote for fear that it will come to mean the return of women to Parliament. Now, if their conviction regarding the inferiority of women's political capacity be sound—as I for one, speaking generally, am inclined to believe—there is no danger of women being returned to Parliament save in such small numbers as to make no matter. If it be unsound—if the political capacity of woman be equal to man's—it is time Parliament were reinforced by women's presence. New waters soon find their level. Nor are such as distrust the political capacities of women qualified to prophesy a flood. To debar women for fear of their competition is a policy of little spirit, and not one that the men of this country will consciously adopt, unless we have indeed lost the fire of our fathers. There are some, too, who believe that the granting of the vote to women will increase the emotional element in an electorate whose emotional side they already distrust, and thereby endanger our relations with foreign Powers. But it has yet to be proved that women are, in a wide sense of the word, more emotional than men; and even conceding that they are, it must not be forgotten that they will bring to the consideration of international matters the solid reinforcement of two qualities—the first, a practical domestic sense lacking to men, and likely to foster national reluctance to plunge into war; the second, a greater faculty for self-sacrifice, tending to fortify national determination to persist in a war once undertaken. It is well known that during the American Civil War the women of the Southern States displayed a spirit of resistance even more heroic than that of their men folk. But in any case, to retain women in their present state of social and political inferiority for reasons which are so utterly debatable, savors, surely, somewhat of the sultan's. We have, in fact, yet to imbibed the spirit of Mill's wisest saying:—"Amongst all the lessons which men require for carrying on the struggle against the evident imperfections of their lot on earth, there is no lesson which they more need than not to add to the evils which Nature inflicts, by their jealous and prejudiced restrictions on one another."

In fine, out of the perplexity brooding over this whole matter there is no way save by resort to the first principles of gentility. If it be established—as it has been, and incontrovertibly—that there are in this country a great and ever-increasing body of women suffering from a bitter sense of injustice, what course, compatible with true gentility, have we men but to examine, and, if it seem to us right, to remedy the evil; disregarding party interest; disregarding, too, the fact that a portion of these women may themselves be acting in ungentle fashion? Are we not bound, as it were, in honor, going apart from the winds of talk and action, to contemplate the divinity in things; to read the true meaning of all our social life; to see it for what it is, a long, slow striving for the victory of justice over force? And from this pilgrimage shall we not come back, seeing that the demand of our women for emancipation is but a symbol of that striving; shall we not come back feeling that it has become blasphemy to go against it; shall we not give fruition at last to this idea; saying, with all our hearts: From this resistance to the claims of Equity; from this bitter and ungracious conflict with those weaker than ourselves; from this slow poisoning of the well-springs of our national courtesy, and kindliness, and sense of fair play: "Gentles, let us rest!"

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

The Drama.

THE "ELEKTRA" AS A PLAY.

WHAT is the public to say when critics so finely equipped as Mr. Shaw and Mr. Newman quarrel fiercely and fundamentally over a work like the "Elektra" of Strauss? Nothing more, perhaps, than that it has all happened before, and that the champions of three great poets have raged about the Elektra of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides much as our amateurs are raging about the work of Strauss and von Hoffmanstahl. The problems of that fearful drama are endless. Who was right? Who was wrong? Was the tragedy of the House of Atreus fore-meant and pre-ordained, by gods that could not err, or were grossly fallible as men, or was it merely the work of wicked human wills? Is judgment possible; and if it is, shall we take sides with Elektra or with Clytæmnestra?

These puzzles the literary mind will ask itself for ever. What does not seem to be in question is the right of the artist to take one of these world-tales and make what use he can of it for his time and generation. This, at least, is what Strauss and Hoffmanstahl have done; swiftly condensing and clarifying the action, making something new of the duel between Clytæmnestra and Elektra, and yet not turning it essentially from its Sophoclean setting (for neither the conception of Aeschylus nor that of Euripides is largely drawn from). No one with so slow and fallible a musical sense as mine can himself say that in one hearing of this music-drama he is entitled to take sides either with Mr. Shaw or with Mr. Newman. But let me repeat, with humility, one of my impressions, which happens to coincide with Mr. Shaw's. In the earlier parts of the "Elektra" I found myself laboriously spelling out the music and fitting it in with the drama, with many a failure to find congruity and satisfaction. But in the end the music conquered, until Strauss's devices, be they bad or good, over-sensuous or over-savage, joined themselves to the swift and tumultuous movement of the play, and I hardly heard its separate rhythm, any more, I suppose, than the Blessed distinguish the instruments that produce the Music of the Spheres or the Song of the Redeemed in Heaven. Now and then I did so distinguish. But when drums crashed and fiddles shrieked as Clytæmnestra met her doom, I was too hypnotised to ask myself whether this was the appropriate musical comment, or whether I ought not to prefer the elaborate thought-out rehearsal of a tragic event, such as Wagner executes for us in the Funeral March of "Siegfried."

If there were cacophonies, I missed them, just as when Irving pleased me, I ceased to think of what I disliked in his voice and stage manner. I offer myself, therefore, as a victim to Mr. Shaw or Mr. Newman, equally helpless in the hands of either. But the power of sweeping the average man off his feet, and carrying him up to steep places of emotion, Strauss (me teste) does possess.

To what end does he exert it? To mere nerve excitation, or to the tragic poet's purpose of purging the bosom with pity and terror? Frau Krull's Elektra was clearly meant to illustrate the second design; earlier interpretations of the character, as well as the language of Elektra's first soliloquy, might well be taken to lead to the first. When Clytæmnestra appeared, musical and dramatic intention seemed to me to develop into something original and powerful. It was a horrible thing; a new reading of the black business of Clytæmnestra's heart, just as it was a new decking of her body to make it look like a bloated Theodora, or that other Vision of Sin which was "arrayed in purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having in her hand a golden cup full of abominations, even the unclean things of her fornication." Strauss and Hoffmanstahl usher in this figure with the sounds of slaughter, and of the hurrying of frightened figures through the dark corridors of the palace of Mycenæ, and wedge her in with an obscene gibbering chorus of slaves and fellow-sinners in that place of Hell. I see that some critics complain that this is no more classic Greek than is the pale, monstrous face of Clytæmnestra, a mirror of fear and weariness and sated lust. But were the Greeks so very classical? Is Aeschylus as frigid as Corneille? Do their favorite themes suggest the modern shirking of trouble, or is it the delicate timidity of our civilisation which has converted the moral purposes of Greek literature into problems in æsthetics? Or, being unable to read iambics and chorus-metres as they were meant to be read, do we let their beautiful form mask the true meaning of the stories they illustrate? And in any case, what is Hecuba to us or we to Hecuba, unless she comes into our experience of life as it is lived to-day? Even if the modern artist loses in measure as compared with the classic original, he gains in force and directness, and in the conflict between the two women, one bedizened with the spoils of wealth, the other in grey sackcloth—one looking forward to the judgment whose vision robs her of peace by day and by night, the other, disinherited but coldly expectant of the great change—it is open to the student of his times to read the moral that artists like Aubrey Beardsley read in his studies of our fashionable streets and restaurants, and of the beings who haunted them.

The lover of reserve in art may draw back from such portraiture, and carry with him the verdict of intellectual refinement. But the satirist and the poet will not necessarily join him. Blake cannot get the pictures of Hell out of his mind's eye, and Shelley will discover them to be much like the sights of London. Mr. Newman is quite as generous as Mr. Shaw in his praise of what he selects as the great passages of Strauss's "Elektra," and the music which described the meeting between Orestes and his sister—not in fitful relief from unpleasant scoring, as one critic suggests, but in a prolonged beauty of expression, answering to each wave-beat of joy in Elektra's bosom—was long ago married to immortal verse. The question is whether the musical realist has not captured a great audience for art and morals when he chooses such themes as that of Elektra and illustrates them in the manner of Strauss. If he has exceeded the proper limits of his art, it is clear that he must fail. If he has really debased his theme, he will not live. But the general charge of decadence lies equally against Strauss and the author of "The Power of Darkness"; and it is made (I do not, of course, refer to Mr. Newman) by those critics whose view of life is both æsthetic and conservative, who invite the modern artist to turn his eyes away from our slums and on to our green lanes, and to offer us soothing syrup, in place of the cup of the wine of the fierceness of the wrath of God.

BRITISH SPORT: HOW IT IS CHANGING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Sport has been defined as "The fair, difficult, exciting, perhaps dangerous pursuit of a wild animal that has the odds in its favor, whose courage, speed, strength and cunning are more or less a match for our own, and whose death, being of service, is justifiable."

This very inaccurate description of what we to-day term "sport," kept recurring to me at Altcar, where a friend had persuaded me to join him to watch the coursing. I had seen coursing before, also some of the brutal exhibitions of "pull-baker-pull-devil" termed rabbit-coursing. This was the first time, however, that it had been my privilege to watch the blue ribbon of British coursing, namely, the competitions for the Waterloo Cup. Again and again I had been told, "Oh, you ought to see the coursing at Altcar; you don't know what coursing is until you see that; it's the grandest sport on earth."

Well, now I have seen it, and I can't say that I shall ever clamor to see it again. "The fair, difficult, exciting, perhaps dangerous pursuit of a wild animal" (sic). Who, I wonder, compiled that remarkable definition for the Badminton Library? Can he ever have seen coursing? Hardly, one would think. It is "fair," and it is "sport," in so far that the hares are wild hares, and that they are beaten up on land they know, whereas in rabbit-coursing the rabbits are taken to the ground in sacks, and consequently, when released, run hither and thither without in the least knowing where to make for, the lie of the land being strange to them. It is "difficult," yes, but only for the greyhounds, whereas the compiler of the definition quoted meant to imply that the "difficulty" in connection with sport would rest with the sportsman. Certainly it is "exciting," yet I doubt if the excitement would be great were betting not connected with the "sport." As for there being the least element of danger to any who take part in it, that there emphatically is not; nor does coursing serve any good purpose, as hunting, shooting, fishing, steeplechasing, and practically all forms of true sport do by quickening power of observation, or by inculcating patience, or by teaching woodcraft, or by cultivating "nerve" and judgment and instilling self-confidence.

It may be un-English to say so, but personally I would any day sooner watch a bull-fight than a coursing match. I was present at a bull-fight in Pueblo years ago, and though it is horrible to see horses ripped up, especially old horses which no longer are active enough to avoid the bull's on-rushes, at least there is an element of danger to the men engaged in the fight, and the game is a manly one so far as they are concerned. With regard to coursing, however, as a 'cross-country rider with me at Altcar remarked, "there's about as much 'devil' about this job as there is in croquet, and the odds are all on the greyhounds."

Is British sport, then, really coming to this—that we are going to prefer amusements such as coursing and otter-hunting, that have in them no spice of danger, that call for no skill upon the part of those who engage in them, as hunting, shooting, and fishing do, and that need no pluck of any kind—are we really going to prefer "muffish" to manly forms of sport, and "muffish" to manly games? Otter-hunting is said to be growing annually more popular, while the Waterloo Cup, inaugurated in 1836, has now grown to be a national event in the opinion of a particular set of sportsmen. There is outcry in these days that so many hundreds of young and active lads should waste their Saturday afternoons in watching—and incidentally in betting upon—football matches when a great proportion could themselves be indulging in some form of active amusement. No doubt there is ground for complaint, but football is at any rate a game needing both skill and pluck, and therefore it is worth watching; whereas in connection with coursing there can be nothing fine or manly. The odds, as has been said, are all on the greyhounds, and of course every greyhound that is slipped is in the very pink of condition.

Indeed it is regrettable that the popularity of the games and the branches of sport which call for "grit" and determination should in this country be dwindling—football and cricket excepted—whereas games needing only skill, and some of them but little of that, grow persistently more popular. It is a common sight to-day to see mere lads playing at croquet, while golf, from being a game deemed suitable only for men of middle age, is now played in many schools. The size of hunting-fields has increased considerably of late years, but has the number of men who really ride to hounds increased at all in proportion? It will, I think, be admitted by men who are in a position to speak with authority, so far as the countries in which they themselves hunt are concerned, that the number of good men to hounds has not increased in anything approaching an adequate proportion.

Against this it may be urged that the popularity of point-to-point chasing has increased by leaps and bounds; it is true that the close of the present hunting season will witness more "point-to-points" than have ever been run before. Equally true it is, however, that the number of point-to-point riders has not greatly increased of recent years. Go from meeting to meeting and you will see the same riders up, time after time, just as you do in "legitimate" steeplechasing. A point that strikes me forcibly in this connection—and I write quite impartially—is that though the general level of horsemanship in the hunting countries with which I am acquainted does not show a tendency to improve among the men, owing probably to the fact that the rising generation of men for the most part devote their attention to motoring rather than to horsemanship, women seem, upon the whole, to ride better than they used to do, and to be growing keener about it.

Plenty of men will of course tell you that the women who ride across country quite fearlessly do so in almost every instance through ignorance—"Where there is no knowledge of danger," they will quote, "there cannot be fear." To that theory I have long been opposed, for the theory is an utterly false one. Dozens of times I have seen women who well knew the risks they ran in taking certain lines of country of their own when hounds were running hard, give men who were hesitating at an awkward fence a lead over. For a woman's intuition and her quickness of thought and of decision serve her in the hunting-field just as they do elsewhere. When, for instance, hounds suddenly throw up their heads, and the field, huddled together, are wondering which way the fox has turned, more often than not it is one of the women riders who first draws the master's or the huntsman's attention to uneasiness amongst the cattle several fields away. The huntsman makes a cast in that direction, and the pack hit off the line, and in a minute or so they are racing through the field where the cattle are that had been disturbed by the fox's passing by.

It is curious—it may be significant—that while a vast proportion of the men of the well-to-do classes seem to be satisfied with amusements needing neither nerve nor "grit," women are becoming more and more addicted to games and to forms of sport that call for risk to limb and sometimes to life. Whether the fashion of riding in astride saddles, that has steadily spread ever since Mrs. Alec Tweedie first set the example, is to be recommended, it is hard to say. The astride-seat is preferable when the rider is mounted on an animal that is inclined to rear, and of course in a side-saddle the horse cannot be "squeezed" when coming to a fence.—Yours, &c.,

Letters to the Editor.

STRAUSS AND HIS "ELEKTRA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Shaw's second letter makes argument with him more possible than the first did. He himself aptly described that as a yell; and discussion with Mr. Shaw while he is merely yelling is too much like arguing with a locomotive whistle in full blast. But now that Mr. Shaw's manner has lost something of its blend of the patronising pedagogue and the swaggering bully, we can get more directly to the real matter in hand.

My offence, it seems, is a triple one. (1) I wrote an article upon "Elektra" in my own way and from my own standpoint, instead of first finding out the way and the standpoint of Mr. Shaw, and writing accordingly. This, I own, was unpardonable, and I apologise for it. (2) I took a wrong view of Strauss and "Elektra." (3) In expressing this view, I necessarily made use of language that was not always complimentary to Strauss. Let us first look at No. 2.

Mr. Shaw has now heard "Elektra," and he pronounces it very good. I know that this authoritative announcement ought to be enough; but I am still so perverse as to maintain that parts of "Elektra" are very ugly, and other parts of it a failure. I repeat that there are abundant signs in it of the development of the bad elements that have spoiled so much of Strauss's work during the last few years—ugly, slap-dash vocal writing, which he attempts to carry through by means of orchestral bravado, a crude pictorialism, ineffective violence simulating strength, a general coarsening of the tissue of the music, a steady deterioration in invention, especially on the melody side. Mr. Shaw performs an enthusiastic fantasia upon von Hofmannsthal's drama, which, to my mind and the mind of many others, is—beauty of diction apart—a most unpleasant specimen of that crudity and physical violence that a certain school of modern German artists mistakes for intellectual and emotional power. In setting this violence to music, Strauss tries to out-Herod Herod. I should not blame him so much for this, if the thing were only well done. In "Salome" the subject is a trifle unpleasant, but Strauss has given us a marvellous study of the diseased woman's mind. My complaint against "Elektra" is that he frequently fobs us off with the merest make-believe. The music (I am speaking, of course, of the bad parts of it now) does not itself cut to the roots of the characters as that of "Salome" does; Strauss tries to bluff us partly by the tumult of his orchestration and partly by the easy pathos of the theatre. I have no objection to Mr. Shaw being bluffed in this way; but I am not going to be bluffed myself by means so transparent. Mr. Shaw, in his desperate attempt to justify the ways of Shaw to men, actually tells us that "on Saturday night the crowded house burst into frenzied shoutings, not merely of applause, but of strenuous assent and affirmation, as the curtain fell." The spectacle of Mr. Shaw bringing up the opinion of a British audience on a point of art as a support for his own is delicious. Oh, Bernard, Bernard, has it come to this? May not that applause be accounted for in another way? One curious feature of these "Elektra" performances has been that while many advanced musicians, real admirers of Strauss, have been chilled by the work, the general public has been enthusiastic over it. I take this to be due, roughly speaking, to two causes. Some people have been swept off their feet by the first excitement of the thing; others have been astonished and delighted to find that, so far from the Strauss idiom being so advanced and recondite as they had been led to believe, many of the tunes, such as that of Chrysothemis and that of the final triumph, are of the most friendly and accommodating commonplace. I ask Mr. Shaw to look at the latter theme, on p. 238 of the score, and tell me honestly whether it is not banality itself. It is fit only for third-rate French or Italian opera; you can hear the same kind of tune on the band in the park any Saturday. And, thinking that a theme of this kind is utterly unworthy of Strauss, I have every right to say so. I have a right, again, to speak of the "impudence" of the attempt to bamboozle me into the belief that great music is going on in the orchestra when I know that it is only the big drum banging, or some trick of orchestration sending a shudder under my skin. I have a right to speak of "incompetence" when a composer makes a tremendous show of rising to the supremest heights of a situation, and, in spite of all his mouthing and his violence, falls as far below it as Strauss does in the ineffective noise that accompanies Elektra's digging-up of the axe, or the murder of Aegisthus. (Technical incompetence I never urged against Strauss, as Mr. Shaw seems to think.) I have a right to say that pages such as 36-40, or 53-56 (there are many others like them) are an unblushing evasion of the problem of thinking coherently and continuously in music. I hold, in a word, that much of "Elektra" is merely frigid intellectual calculation simulating a white heat of emotion. I find that Mr. Shaw once expressed, à propos of Marlowe, the very point I would make here: Marlowe, he says, is "itching to frighten other people with the superstitious terrors and cruelties in which he does not himself believe, and wallowing in blood, violence, muscularity of expression, and strenuous animal passion, as only literary men do when they become thoroughly depraved by solitary work, sedentary cowardice, and starvation of the sympathetic centres." Precisely. I would explain the bogus passion and bogus hysterics of a good deal of Strauss's later music in the same way. He drives furiously at us, with all his enormous cerebral energy and his stupendous technique; but at heart he is cold, for all the whipping and spurring. He reminds me, in moments like these, of the beggars who simulate epilepsy in the streets, producing the foaming at the mouth by chewing a piece of soap. I have no objection to the sympathetic and trustful Mr. Shaw believing the fit to be a real one; but he really must not lose his temper because, having learned some of the tricks of the trade, I assure him that I can see the soap.

And now for No. 3. Mr. Shaw heatedly objected to the tone of some of my criticism of Strauss. It was "neither good manners" (Mr. Shaw is our leading authority on manners) "nor good sense" for "writers of modest local standing to talk de haut en bas to men of European reputation"; it was an "intolerable thing, an exploded thing, a parochial, boorish thing," and Heaven only knows what else. Very good; but who is this purist who yells so deafeningly for moderation in criticism? Let us look for a moment at a few passages of Mr. Shaw's own that he appears to have forgotten. He has lately called Schubert a mere confectioner. He once called Marlowe a fool—"the fellow was a fool." Unless my memory is greatly at fault, he once called Shakespeare an idiot—though I will accept Mr. Shaw's correction here if I am wrong. But he certainly wrote that "Cymbeline" "is for the most part stagey trash of the lowest melodramatic order, in parts abominably written, throughout intellectually vulgar, and, judged in point of thought by modern intellectual standards, vulgar, foolish, offensive, indecent, and exasperating beyond all tolerance." Again, the same poor Shakespeare, "in his efforts to be a social philosopher," can only "rise for an instant to the level of a sixth-rate Kingsley"; but Mr. Shaw cannot stand "his moral platitudes, his jingo claptraps, his tavern pleasantries, his bombast and drivel, his incapacity for following up the scraps of philosophy he stole so aptly," nor "his usual incapacity for pursuing any idea." He tells us frankly that his own "Cæsar and Cleopatra" is an improvement on Shakespeare. In fact, says Mr. Shaw, "with the single exception of Homer, there is no eminent writer, not even Sir Walter Scott, whom I can despise so entirely as I despise Shakespeare when I measure my mind against his." Some unkind people might say that this was a case of a writer of modest local standing talking to a man of European reputation de haut en bas. Shakespeare's reputation, I fancy, is European; and if I say nothing about the modest local standing, it is solely because I hesitate to incur the responsibility of mentioning modesty and Mr. Bernard Shaw in the same sentence.

I know what he will say to this—that all these dicta of his upon Shakespeare were based upon a study of his dramas, and that while blaming Shakespeare for many things he praised him for others. But that is exactly my attitude towards Strauss. If, then, it is right for Mr. Shaw, it cannot be wrong for me; if it is wrong for me, it cannot be right for him. At all events, if he is going to set out to prove the contrary he will need a better equipment than a penful of scurrilous impertinence and a disgracefully bad memory for his own past.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST NEWMAN.

March 22nd, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As was to be hoped, Mr. Bernard Shaw, having seen Strauss's "Elektra," has vouchsafed your readers the benefit of his original and serious point of view. His onslaught upon Mr. Ernest Newman was, of course, the most formidable and flattering tribute payable to that critic's merits. Mr. Shaw has himself been through the treadmill of our musical criticism. It reduced him, he has told us, to the condition of a worn-out cab horse. In London a physical staying-power of nerveless brute strength, a flaccid eye, fixed anxiously upon the fluctuations of the advertisement trade, and a mechanical pen apt to the manufacture of convictionless platitudes, are obviously the prime qualifications that bid for the lucrative and nameless obscurity of a thoroughly successful and long-lived musical critic, sought and trusted of editors, who assure us, if quite needlessly, that for music, as music, they know nothing, and care less. It is unlikely that Mr. Newman would cope peacefully with the editorial standpoint of London's musical interests for as long as a week, and certainly not Mr. Shaw. Mr. Shaw, therefore, if he disagree with Mr. Newman, has at least tacitly confessed that here is an adversary of mettle worth fighting. There are various interesting points in the discussion of the two opponents. Mr. Shaw maintains that contemporary European fame is an infallible proof of Strauss's genius. Strauss has obtained no greater fame; and commands the money market no more than did Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn; and at the present moment it is doubtful whether Strauss, or, for that matter, Mr. Shaw himself, has a wider reputation than Miss Maud Allen. So much for the worth, or the worthlessness, as the case may be, of European fame.

Mr. Newman declared it absurd and irrelevant of Mr. Shaw to pronounce an opinion on "Elektra" without a hearing. But supposing (as is probable) that Mr. Shaw had already studied half a dozen of Strauss's works, then he was perfectly qualified to know exactly what to expect of Strauss, nor would Strauss for an instant disappoint him. Whether it be the "Don Quixote Variations," the "Heldenleben," or "Salome," or "Elektra," there is always in Strauss the same mighty mental jugglery in handling great masses of sound; the same unrivalled gift of condensation and terseness, a gift to be specially commended, perhaps, to Mr. Shaw's own attention.

What Wagner took four to five hours to express, Strauss condenses lucidly into one and a half; and this without the aid of any cumbrously elaborated costly scenic appliances. Strauss may be called the chief democratic force of contemporary art. I would suggest that he is indeed the one living artist who can make a democratic concourse unobjectionable, nay, even almost attractive. It is highly significant of the supreme position which music has assumed as a social democratic element, that Strauss, of all men, should be a musician, and not a scientist or a writer. Like Mr. Shaw, moreover, he has completely mastered the art and technique of expressing the warp and woof of his own individuality as a human being; and in Strauss (one has but to look at him, and speak to him, to perceive this) his brain altogether eclipses his emotions. Compare his portrait, for instance, with those of Beethoven, Berlioz, Wagner, Cesar Franck, Debussy. The lower part of his face is comparatively insignificant, curiously undeveloped and expressionless. But from the eyes upwards the breadth and strength of his head are extraordinary. Here is something unequalled in musical physiognomy. I believe that physiognomy can serve as a far truer index and guide to the value and nature of an artist's work than half a dozen European fames en bloc. The mental quality of music can only be gauged by the composer's capacity as a harmonist, and one can only offer one's own experience for what it may be worth. I have had, perhaps, certain unusual opportunities for hearing and studying music. I confess that in listening to "Elektra" I was carried away by none of the emotional ecstasy that overwhelmed Mr. Shaw. Personally, I find in the whole harmonic structure of Strauss's orchestration one of the keenest and most quickening mental tonics that I can indulge in. I enjoy it just as I enjoy a play by Mr. Shaw. There are, doubtless, others who feel as I do, albeit at one of the recent Covent Garden performances I noted in my own immediate vicinity no less than three persons (two men and one woman) who long before the end of Elektra's first soliloquy were slumbering peacefully in their stalls. They may possibly have been some of the daily paper critics. If harmony be the mental texture of music, melody is equally its emotional content. And here I, for one, would humbly venture to do homage to the insight of "poor" Mr. Newman's criticism of Strauss. Harmony may also be considered as the masculine element in music, melody as its feminine basis if, that is, it be correct that woman at her best is a feeling, rather than a thinking, being. In "Elektra," still more than in "Salome," Strauss has attempted to grapple with the feminine problem of human existence. As I listened to the wonderful gyrations of Strauss's brain in his orchestra and watched the fruit of his imagination coarsened into concrete action on the stage, involuntarily there came back to my mind an ejaculation of R. L. Stevenson to Mr. William Archer anent some of Mr. Shaw's feminine psychologisings: "But, I say, Archer, my God! what women!"—Yours, &c., March 22nd, 1910.

A. E. KEETON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the recent exchange of civilities between Mr. Newman and Mr. Shaw, I side with Mr. Shaw, but the conclusion of his letter in your issue of last week moves me to offer a comment. I like Mr. Shaw's idea that "Elektra" is to be regarded as a sort of cosmic melodrama, that the Clytemnestra régime stands for "the omnipresent villainies of our civilisation"; in short, for all the tyrannies and monopolies; and that Elektra and Orestes tickle the hearer's sense of justice by bringing off a really final and deadlift effort in trust-bursting. But is not Mr. Shaw rather too hopeful (he usually is) when he brings this essentially sound interpretation into focus with the "frenzied shoutings" (of the London opera public), "not merely of applause, but of strenuous assent and affirmation"? Was the recent furore on Strauss nights really informed by the spirit of social democracy? I put the matter to a rough test on Saturday last, when I went again, in company with a perhaps too literal friend, who had also read Mr. Shaw's letter with approval. My friend's topical murmurings throughout the performance distressed me, but they gave me to think. His line is municipal politics, and when the grisly "march of the beasts" struck in, heralding the first approach of Clytemnestra, he sibilated: "Here comes Captain Jessel and the Coal Consumers' League." He expanded more and more during the following scene between Clytemnestra and Elektra, in which the "Municipal Reformers" so obviously get the worst of it, and he had to pull himself together when the false report of the death of the Land Clauses (brought in by Confederates) culminates in the temporary triumph and Satanic exit of Right Hon. W. Long and Budget Protest League. Finally, we rejoiced when old Standard Oil went stupidly to his doom, ushered, appropriately enough, by Elektra, with a torch, and we were not surprised that he put up a bit of a fight at the window. We could imagine that in the general scrimmage behind the scenes Red Rubber and Tsarism shared in the culbute universale, so that the decks should be quite clear for Elektra's final Carmagnole.

Seriously, I ask Mr. Shaw to reconsider. What proportion of boxes, stalls, circle, and gallery are really so dissatisfied with things as they are? How many of them are Fabians, or even anti-Veto men? In my humble judgment, the Veto would be settled by now if Mr. Shaw's "strenuous assent and affirmation" were within miles of the truth. I can think of half a dozen reasons for the success of "Elektra" (obvious to your readers also) that are far more plausible and far less edifying than Mr. Shaw's.—Yours, &c.,

ONE WHO WISHES HE COULD BELIEVE IN IT.

March 22nd, 1910.

[But when we see guilt and shame on the stage, do we not fit its exposition to our own most acute sense of what is wrong within—with ourselves—and without—with the world?—ED., NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As one who has not only not heard "Elektra," but has given away her tickets from the conviction that the chief result of hearing it would be physical tiredness and mental dissatisfaction, I have, perhaps, slight claim to enter the lists with Mr. Ernest Newman against so crushing an adversary as Mr. Bernard Shaw.

Yet, having read Mr. Newman's criticism of Strauss's opera with real gratitude that a critic has arisen independent enough to protest against the school of fleshly-intellectual art of which Dr. Strauss is only one exponent (great enough to form a natural point of departure for discussion), perhaps you will allow me to try and point out what seems the underlying and profoundly important matter of divergence between these two views, apart from all question as to the undisputed greatness of Dr. Strauss, the critical competence of Mr. Newman, or the somewhat brow-beating cleverness of Mr. Shaw.

Is it not the whole difference between the idealistic and materialistic points of view which is here in question—the age-long contest between light and darkness (the darkness being all the more insidious from being disguised as light—the light of intellect, and power, and limitless skill)? We have only to compare the impression made on us by such music as Beethoven's three Leonora Overtures (to which I was happy enough to listen yesterday) with the music of the ultra-modern school, with its unlimited means of expression and poverty of matter to express, to realise that the art of music is the very battleground whereon the tremendous issue of Flesh or Spirit, Life or Death, is destined to be fought out.

Compare for a moment the subject-matter of "Fidelio" with that of "Elektra." The one finds its inspiration in that noble and enduring human love which forms a spiritual groundwork for society, opening up endless vistas to the soul. The other is based on an episode of adultery, murder, and vengeance—all the evil passions which disintegrate the social structure and obscure the higher destinies of mankind. In the Trilogy of Æschylus, the murder of Klytemnestra is seen in its due relation to the idea which dominates the whole—the expiation by Orestes of the doom laid on his house by the sin of Tantalus, and the gradual withdrawal of the Erinnyes from their pursuit of the fated descendant.

But, to take one section of the tragedy and exalt the lust of vengeance in a woman (who does not really occupy this prominent place in the drama) into the main theme of the opera, is surely to degrade the office of music, which might be called the Soul's own handmaid, speaking, as it does, a language which is in more intimate correspondence with its needs than any other. If these needs are more and more assumed to be, as in "Elektra," physical excitement, unrestrained passion, and the purely earthly aspect of life, and if music is to minister to these things by every resource of art and sensuous effect, where are we to turn in the future for the glorious sense of joy and freedom (won through self-conquest) which uplifts us in such music as that of Beethoven?

Hence the possibly half-conscious ground of such a protest as Mr. Newman's has a value and significance entirely missed (or ignored) by Mr. Shaw. To cling to the function of music as being the noblest "Knight of the Holy Ghost" among the arts is surely to care profoundly for the future of humanity, and to safeguard its best interests.

And it is, moreover, significant that the best soil for such an art is oftener found to be the stony one whereon the feet of Beethoven so often bled than the luxurious "interiors" where Wealth spreads its velvet carpet, and the artist's soul (though not his brain) is stifled by materialism.

"THE RING" AT EDINBURGH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I say a word to soothe the susceptibilities of "Edinburgh" and "Edinensis"? If the latter will read once more the quotation he makes from my article, he will see that the comparison was between Wagner as played by a first-rate orchestra like the Scottish, and Wagner as played by the orchestra of the average touring company. As for the "whole-hearted support of the Press," my information as to the character of the "support" given to Mr. Denhof by one or two of the greater journals, in the months when he most needed help, came to me on unimpeachable authority. And as for my supposed disparagement of the musical Press of Scotland, I would say, first of all, that no reflection was made on that Press as a whole, and that the occasional blunders—for example, in telling the story of "The Ring"—that I had in mind were observed by me in my own reading. But I notice that while "Edinburgh" assures me that "the Scottish Press is well informed on musical matters," "Edinensis" holds that, "as a rule, the Edinburgh Press is unfortunately not well enough instructed" to give "adequate recognition" to Mr. Denhof's work. Perhaps they will settle the point between them.—Yours, &c.,

LIBERAL LEADERSHIP.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At a critical political juncture such as exists at present, grave differences of opinion must exist and must be expected. Leadership at such a time is most needed to overpower and harmonise the differences that exist amongst party leaders and publicists, such as yourself. No party in the State at present has a man who can claim to be a great leader. This is unfortunate, because when the generals are of about the same calibre, effective campaigning is difficult, and the soldiers in the line must think out their own strategy. As a "ranker," I think your position on the present deadlock is not sound.

I hold the Budget was the first issue at the election, because it was on finance the Government resigned. To say the Veto precedes the Budget in public importance is, in my mind, to refuse to accept the facts of the election. The action of the Irish and Radicals in making the Government change its policy is not wise. Redress of grievance before Supply is good enough, but the Budget provides for a year that is now almost complete, and should have been passed first, in vindication of the Commons' rights. By doing so the public would have been saved loss which they have no right to suffer through the quarrel of the two Houses and the manœuvring of groups in Parliament. At the same time, the Commons' power over Supply for the new financial year would have been as strong a weapon as they needed. I make bold to say no party dare face the electors with the plea: "Supply stopped because of the House of Lords." It would be annihilation for that party.

I therefore welcome Sir Edward Grey's strong line of veto and reform.

You say it was not before the electors, but we send representatives to Parliament, not delegates. These representatives must interpret what their constituents wish in the ever changing circumstances. The circumstances are changed; the House of Lords have agreed to positive action to counteract the veto proposals. Our representatives in Parliament must meet the new situation for us. I therefore agree with Sir Edward Grey that to go to the country with the cry: "The veto and an unreformed House of Lords and House of Commons" is folly. No Liberal proposes a Second Chamber "to be a powerful rival of the House of Commons." But a Second Chamber is necessary to the smooth working of the legislative machine. There is never any first-class Bill in the House of Commons which is not closed, and important sections are passed without proper discussion. Should there not be a proper revising Chamber to look after the people's interests, and see there is no dangerous section in these undiscussed parts? In these days of Parliamentary groups, when a group can, as the price of their support, make the Government adopt certain clauses they do not desire, should there not be a revising chamber able to protect the majority against the minority? For these and many reasons, I think Sir Edward Grey is accentuating the proper ideas at the present time, and is keeping in the party men who would have nothing to do with the Veto only. I should be quite content with the Veto only, and desire nothing more; but when we have not a great leader, we must draw from the leaders the best they can give.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN M. HOGGE.

LORDS AND COMMONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I suppose we may now assume as certain that the plan of the Government is to proceed against the Lords on the lines of the the Campbell-Bannerman resolutions.

This plan will, of course, be rejected by the Lords, and in that case there is little chance of passing the Budget. A dissolution must follow, and the Ministry will go before the electors with no record of achievement, with the finances in a state of chaos, and with nothing done to remove the inequalities of the electoral law. Under these conditions he must be a very sanguine Liberal who will expect even as good a result as at the last election, and an adverse majority is much more likely. Tariff Reform will then be carried, and great vested interests will be created, which will exclude the Free Trade party from power for many years. I do not say that this will certainly happen, but its probability can hardly be denied. Is it, however, necessary to face this prospect with no effort to avoid it? If we cannot get all that is desired, surely it is better to secure what is possible than to accept complete defeat. If there is no way of forcing a Bill through the Lords, cannot one be devised which would remove the present deadlock and yet pass the Lords? Suppose it were provided that the number of hereditary peers sitting in the House be reduced in number, that future peerages be for life, and that in case of disagreement both Houses sit together. As such a Bill would be no derogation to the Lords, and they profess to desire reform, it is difficult to think that they would reject it; or, if they did, they would stand forth as obstructors naked and unashamed. Of course, I do not put this forward as an ideal scheme, but the absolute bar to legislation would be removed, the Budget would pass, new electoral laws could be carried before a dissolution, and any further Bill dealing with the powers and composition of the House of Lords could be passed whenever the Liberals have a large majority in the Commons.—Yours, &c.,

IRELAND AND THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Dr. Johnson foresaw many British Budgets—Budgets of social weal and Budgets of social ill—when he warned his Irish acquaintance: “Do not make a Union with us, sir. We should unite with you only to rob you; we should have robbed the Scotch if they had had anything of which we could have robbed them.” Mr. Gladstone, himself one of the most ruthless plunderers of Ireland in his day, realised towards the end of his life that Johnson’s prophecy had come true, and in April, 1896, he declared that the Report of the Commission on Irish Finance was a thing “which I rejoice to have had a share in leaving as one of my best (or last) legacies to the country.” One of the findings of that Commission was “that whilst the actual tax revenue of Ireland is about one-eleventh of that of Great Britain, the relative taxable capacity of Ireland is very much smaller, and is not estimated by any of us as exceeding one-twentieth.” One-twentieth, be it remembered, was the highest proportion which any member of the Commission believed could be justly laid on the shoulders of Ireland. Other authorities, however, basing their estimate on an Income-tax comparison suggested by Lord Castlereagh at the time of the Union, put the figure, not at one-twentieth, but at one-thirty-second.

Now, the supporters of the Budget, so far as I can see, are for throwing over the Report of Mr. Gladstone’s Commission and for ignoring all the facts of the financial plunder of Ireland which have been made known since that time. Old Age Pensions and land purchase bonuses—every penny of which, by the way, comes out of Ireland’s own rifled pocket—are apparently supposed to be heroic exhibitions of British generosity and self-sacrifice, atoning for all past thefts. Sir, if the new Budget did not levy an extra half-penny on Ireland, not even then would it atone for all past thefts. At the lowest computation, however, it levies an additional toll on Ireland of £535,000, or about 2s. 6d. a head on every man, woman, and child in the country. At the highest computation, it levies an extra £2,000,000, about 10s. a head on every man, woman, and child in the country. I do not care which figure you take, it is still plunder. If the lower figure is correct, then one of the things it means is that, aiming at taxing the Irish consumer, you have instead gone some way towards destroying one of Ireland’s few industries—the distilling industry. Let the Editor of “The Economist” play with figures as he pleases, he cannot get over the fact that this Budget, however excellent and just for England, makes for the social and industrial impoverishment of Ireland. Not of the distillers, or publicans, or farmers, or any one class, be it noted, but of the Irish nation. England, as a collector of taxes, stands to Ireland in the relation of a gross absentee landlord, who devises all his exactions solely to suit his own weal. No other absentee landlord ever ground the faces of our poor as England has done.

May I give a few figures to suggest the extent to which Ireland is over-taxed, even according to British standards? Mr. Hobhouse declared recently in the Westminster Parliament that “the amount of Imperial taxation contributed by Ireland in 1895-6, on the basis of calculation adopted in the Financial Relations returns, was £8,034,384, and in 1908-9 £9,250,500. Had the taxation in 1895-6 been “just”—that is, had the Irish share been one-twentieth of that of Great Britain—Ireland would, according to Mr. Hobhouse, have contributed £5,132,047, or £2,902,337 less than she actually did. Under the new Budget, however, at the lowest computation, she is to contribute £9,250,500, plus £535,000—that is, something in the neighborhood of £10,000,000, or nearly twice the sum which very moderate people thought her fit to contribute in 1895-6. Now, does anyone suggest that Ireland to-day is able to bear twice the financial burden she was fit to support fifteen years ago? No one, except a madman, would do so, in view of the fact that still more land has gone out of tillage, emigration has continued practically unchecked, and the paupers have not ceased to pour into the workhouses in their discolored hosts. The national revival has so far represented the break of an ebb rather than the return sweep of the tide.

Even Pitt and Castlereagh, it should be remembered, corrupt as were their aims and influences, never contemplated that the same scheme of taxation could justly be applied to a wealthy country like England and an impoverished country like Ireland. How different the economic conditions of the two countries are may be seen from a comparison of the results of the effects of a typical Budget in both. According to the Budget of 1905-6, for instance, the tax revenue contributed by Great Britain consisted of, approximately, 51·7 per cent. direct taxes and 48·3 per cent. indirect taxes; Ireland’s contribution, however, consisted of 28·3 direct taxes and 71·7 indirect taxes. Is it not obvious that the conditions of the two countries must be as different as those of England and Hungary? Your new Budget is a pillow which you put under England’s head to give her ease, but you put over Ireland’s face to smother her.

I am not, by the way, greatly concerned with a comparison between Mr. Lloyd George’s Budget and other Budgets, past and possible. So far as Ireland is concerned, in the matter of Chancellors of the Exchequer, it is a case of “an Amurath an Amurath succeeds.” The only change is that in the old days we were frankly the prisoners of Imperial necessity. But now, it seems, we are to be led out and crucified on a cross of British good intentions. We could have borne anything but that.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT LYND.

P.S.—Since writing this, I see Mr. Lloyd George has given a still lower estimate of the amount of Ireland’s extra contribution under the new Budget. The new figure, however, does not vitiate any of my arguments.

THE WOMEN’S CHARTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the article which appears under this heading in the current issue of THE NATION I read with amazement the following sentence: “The whole doctrine of coverture practically suspending the civil existence of a wife and preventing her from taking legal action except through her husband or by his consent is to be assailed.” The learned author of this article appears to be a kind of Rip van Winkle who fell asleep some time in the Middle Ages. Possibly he has been perusing “Shepherd’s Touchstone” or “Coke upon Lyttleton,” and has made the mistake of supposing that these works correctly represent the present state of the law. In order to remove misapprehension, perhaps I may be permitted to state that the civil existence of a married woman at the present day is in no sense suspended, and that she possesses the same civil rights as an unmarried woman or a man. A married woman possesses many privileges which are denied to mere man, such, for example, as exemption from the bankruptcy law (unless she is trading separately from her husband), and the power when she is restrained from anticipation of evading the just claims of her creditors. But although the law restricts her liability, it does not restrict her rights. Every married woman can indulge in any species of litigation without the consent, and against the wishes, of her husband, and no married woman, so far as I know, ever takes legal action "through her husband." The husband, however, retains one peculiar privilege—he is still liable to be sued for his wife's torts (e.g., in respect of a libel written by her), although he has ceased to have any control over her actions.—Yours, &c.,

INSCRIPTIONS IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some time ago I directed public attention to the disgraceful condition of the tomb inscriptions in Westminster Abbey, especially in the north transept, but nothing appears to have been done to remedy the obliteration which will undoubtedly, ere long, wipe away all trace of the last resting places of the great dead, who have made the nation's history so glorious. It is not only apathy deserving the severest censure, but the most inexcusable vandalism on the part of the authorities responsible for the proper care of the Abbey memorials. It is almost impossible at present to locate the graves of Fox, Castlereagh, the Pitts, and others at the entrance to the north transept. I understand there is a Crown Department for the preservation of ancient monuments, and, unless the Dean of Westminster, or whoever else may be responsible, takes the matter up seriously, the sooner the custody of the Abbey monuments passes over into this department the better it will be for the dignity and respect of the nation.

The number of country and foreign visitors who pass through the portals of that ancient fabric within one year must reach an enormous total, and it cannot be disputed that the primary interest for visitors is not the awe-inspiring architecture, nor the lofty walls made venerable by the dust of ages, but the plain flagged pavement, underneath which rests the sacred dust of Britain's mighty men.

It should only be necessary to mention the necessity for improvement in a matter which so largely affects the sentiment of the empire. If it is a question of cost, which, at the most, would only be a trifle, an appeal from the Dean would have an immediate response. The custodians of the Abbey have a duty to perform to the nation, and, if they are unable, through lack of funds, the people will assist them. The necessity for the improvement is urgent, and should be attended to without delay.—Yours, &c.,

THE BATTLE OF THE SCHOOLS IN FRANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

MONSIEUR,—L'article paru sous le titre précédent dans le numéro du 29 janvier de votre revue, m'est tombé sous les yeux seulement ces jours-ci. Me permettez-vous de vous adresser à ce sujet quelques unes des remarques qu'il a suggérées à un français ardemment démocrate et républicain?

Il me semble qu'il existe réellement une inexactitude dans l'affirmation que "it is from the Clerical school that the peasant is recruited who will vote for a Nationalist deputy, and there the workman is trained who will enlist in one of the 'yellow' or 'black-leg' organisations."

Il faut tout d'abord remarquer que les fondateurs de l'école laïque en France, Jules Ferry et tant d'autres, reprochaient précisément aux écoles libres de ne pas être neutres et c'est le principe de la neutralité qu'ils mettaient à la base de leur système comme de seul respectueux de la liberté de conscience de l'enfant et conforme à l'idée républicaine. Ce que font les catholiques en France c'est tout simplement de demander que l'on demeure fidèle à cette tradition, au principe même de la neutralité au moyen duquel on avait jusqu'ici défendu et loué l'école laïque.

Un autre fait à observer c'est dans les récentes lois anti-religieuses passées par le Gouvernement Français ce sont en générale des hommes sortis des écoles libres ou religieuses qui ont fait ces lois, tandis que ceux qui les ont opposées sortaient principalement d'institutions de l'Etat, ce qui prouve jusqu'à l'évidence que la raison des premiers n'avait pas été tellement enchaînée et étouffée.

Mais aujourd'hui que l'Ecole laïque fonctionne partout en France voilà que ceux qui parlaient avec fierté de la neutralité laïque se font maintenant les champions du monopole de l'enseignement et l'on demande que l'Etat fasse les intelligences, crée une forte "intellectual discipline" qu'il donne un enseignement impliquant une attitude de l'esprit tout entier, qui serait difficile, sinon impossible, à concilier avec la doctrine de l'Eglise. Et cela, on le réclame, dit-on, au nom de la solidarité nationale et de l'unité morale du peuple.

C'est là évidemment que nous pénétrons vraiment au cœur de la controverse et j'accepte cette position du problème.

Il serait bon toutefois en passant de remarquer qu'un bon nombre des instituteurs actuels sont anti-patriotes, non pas dans le sens qu'ils sont contre les guerres de Louis XIV. et de Napoléon Ier, mais en ce sens qu'ils suivent fidèlement les enseignements de Hervé: recommandant de planter le drapeau dans le fumier et proclamant que le premier devoir d'un soldat en cas de guerre serait de tirer sur ses généraux. Evidemment le Gouvernement actuel professe officiellement sa désapprobation d'un semblable état d'esprit et a à plusieurs reprises frappé instituteurs ou professeurs. Ceux-ci ont crié à l'intolérance et réclament la liberté d'enseigner, ce qu'ils croient juste. Je ne vois pas pour ma part pourquoi on leur refuserait cette liberté; mais il ne me paraît pas convenable que l'Etat qui veut avant tout réaliser l'unité morale maintienne un système d'éducation qui renferme un si grand nombre d'instituteurs qui détruisent le sentiment national.

Le rôle de l'Etat moderne n'est plus "un roi, une foi, une loi," formule de Louis XIV.; mais, "tous les hommes sont égaux devant la loi, nul ne doit être inquiété pour ses opinions philosophiques ou religieuses," principes posés par la Déclaration des Droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen. L'unité morale imposée par l'Etat, par la force législative et administrative de l'Etat, voilà précisément l'idéal du moyen âge. Dans un état républicain ce qui est fait, entrepris, payé par l'Etat doit être la chose de tous (res publica); voilà pourquoi si l'on pose comme condition de républicanisme, qu'il faut abandonner tout dogme religieux, toute foi en une autorité religieuse, non seulement on n'est pas fidèle à la méthode scientifique qui réclame que les choses d'un même ordre soient jugées par des critères d'un même ordre, mais encore on va à l'encontre de la conception républicaine elle-même puisqu'une grande partie des citoyens ne peuvent prendre une part entière et complète à la vie civique et au progrès politique de la nation par suite de leur croyance à telle ou telle doctrine religieuse.

Si un Etat monarchique dans un pays catholique, disons l'Espagne, prétendait imposer de force un enseignement religieux dont certains citoyens ne voudraient pas, on dirait que c'est un attentat à la liberté de conscience; si le même Etat voulait fermer des écoles où l'on enseignerait une doctrine sociale ou politique ou religieuse qui ne fût pas de son goût, on dirait que c'est de la tyrannie.

... Et l'on aurait raison. Au nom du même principe lorsqu'un Gouvernement, qui se dit républicain, crée un système d'éducation dont les ressources financières sont puisées dans les poches de tous les citoyens sans distinction et que d'autre part il établit des distinctions entre les doctrines philosophiques et veut imposer un enseignement irréligieux ou mieux anti-religieux, je ne vois pas pourquoi l'on ne s'accorderait pas à reconnaître que c'est porter une atteinte à la liberté de conscience, et lorsqu'il prétend fermer certaines écoles (dont un grand nombre donnaient un enseignement à peu près gratuit), sous le prétexte que l'on n'y admet pas la souveraineté absolue de la raison et que l'on y professe que la science expérimentale au point où elle a été laissée il y a une trentaine d'années, est la dernière étape du progrès intellectuel, est-ce qu'on n'a pas aussi le droit de crier à la tyrannie? Est-ce que ce n'est pas vraiment faire du cléricisme, puisque c'est imposer une opinion philosophique par la force de l'Etat.

La république n'est pas une théologie antireligieuse, elle est tout simplement une forme de gouvernement politique, elle est un idéal civique que la Révolution Française, au milieu de fautes inévitables, nous a apporté; elle n'est incompatible avec aucune idée religieuse et le fait de l'existence de républicains comme l'Abbé Lemire à la Chambre, d'un mouvement si hardi au point de vue politique et social que le "Sillon" le prouve jusqu'à l'évidence. Est-ce que le leader de ce mouvement principalement composé de catholiques, Marc Sangnier lui-même n'obligeait pas, en 1903, M. Ferdinand Buisson, député radical, à lui dire: "Je n'ai pas le droit de douter de vos opinions républicaines."

La république en France a des ennemis à droite et à gauche, elle ne les fera pas taire par des atteintes à la liberté de la pensée, mais au contraire par cette "politique d'apaisement" dont parlait récemment M. Briand, par les progrès sociaux qu'elle apportera au prolétariat par une méthode de réconciliation de tous les citoyens autour d'un idéal démocratique élevé.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your current issue you give, through a correspondent, a gratis advertisement to the periodical, "Votes for Women." Some of us, while still supporters of Women's Suffrage, have felt that we cannot countenance, even to the extent of a penny a week for their press organ, the methods of the N. W. S. and P. U. Will you please be good enough to make it known that there are other educative periodicals issued by the constitutional and older organisations, e.g., "The Common Cause," penny weekly, 64, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester; and "The Englishwoman," one shilling monthly, London, Grant Richards?—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

THE COMPLAINT OF THE WANDERING JEW.

(AN OLD FRENCH CHANSON.)

THERE never was on earth
So sorrowful a thing
As the sad history
Which I to you will sing,
The tale so strange and true
Of the undying Jew.

At Brussels in Brabant,
As he passed thro' the street,
The good folk of the town
Amazed him did greet;
With such a beard, I ween,
A man was never seen.

His clothes were worn and old,
Of strange, outlandish air,
And from his waist hung down
The apron cobblers wear;
With figure bowed and bent,
Unresting, on he went.

"Enter this tavern door,
Old venerable man,
We will regale thee here

In the best way we can,
Take, lest thy strength should fail,
With us a pot of ale."

"I must not sit nor stay,
Alas! I tell you true—
But gladly will I drink
A pot of ale with you.
Right sore it grieves my mind
To part from folks so kind."

"Art thou perchance that man
Of whom the Scriptures speak,
Isaac, who walks the earth
Since the first Holy Week?
Say, of thy courtesy,
If thou indeed art he."

"Isaac Laquedem
Is in good sooth my name,
Born in Jerusalem,
A town of royal fame,
Good friends, I tell you true,
You see the deathless Jew.

"I traverse all the seas,
The rivers and the rills,
The deserts and the woods,
The forests and the hills;
O'er mountain and o'er plain,
I go in sun and rain.

"I ask of you no alms,
No alms can lift my curse,
I carry all my days
Five farthings in my purse;
At any time or place
This sum grows never less."

"What was that crime so great
That the good God could deem
Its fitting recompense
Such punishment extreme?
Good Father Isaac, tell How such a thing befell."

"As up the steep hillside,
Jesus His burden bore,
The heavy cross of wood,
He passed before my door,
And said, in accents mild,
'Here will I rest, my child.'

"I, rebel heart and hard,
Cried out, in God's despite,
With raised arm and clenched fist,
'Get, caitiff, from my sight.'
With many a cruel word,
I spurned away Our Lord.

"Jesus looked on me then,
His eyes were full of tears;
'Thou, on this earth must walk
More than a thousand years.
Thou may'st not stop nor stay Until the Judgment Day.'

"I fared forth from that door
Soon as the words were said,
Upon the weary way
I still am doomed to tread.
I know by day or night
No rest and no respite.

"Good sirs, the time has come
To leave your company;
My humble thanks are due,
For your great courtesy;
Each moment more I stay
With torment I must pay."

Reviews.

JACOB BOHME.*

JOHN SPARROW's translation of Böhme was "printed by M.S. for H. Blunden at the Castle in Cornhill" in the troublous year 1648, twenty-four years after Böhme's death. The present editor tells us in his preface that his former volume, containing the "Threefold Life of Man," was so well received by the public that he is encouraged to proceed with the experiment of offering Jacob Böhme to modern readers. It is a remarkable sign of the interest now taken in mysticism that these two bulky volumes should find a publisher. For the illuminated cobbler of Görlitz is fully as queer and fantastical as Swedenborg; and though there was once a sect of Behmenists in Germany, we have not heard of any society in England, pledged to study his writings. Nevertheless, those who have the patience to quarry in this mine will find many precious nuggets embedded in masses of rubble. Böhme was a genius, and men of genius have been content to learn from him. Sir Isaac Newton, William Law, Schelling, Hegel, Ewald, are a goodly list of admirers for an entirely self-taught philosopher. Their respect outweighs the contempt of Warburton, Wesley, and Samuel Johnson; of whom the first declared that Böhme's writings would disgrace Bedlam at full moon, while the lexicographer with more urbanity wished that "Jacob" had imitated St. Paul, who, when he had seen "unutterable things," was content not to try to utter them. In all histories of modern philosophy the philosophus Teutonicus is awarded an honorable place as the pioneer of German idealism.

If Böhme had been born a century earlier, he would probably have been burnt. Lutheran Görlitz, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, was satisfied with somewhat milder measures against the presumptuous mechanic who dared to see visions and think for himself. He was denounced from the pulpit, arrested and driven from the town; he was compelled to promise to write no more; and his character was lampooned in doggerel Latin verses by the pastor of Görlitz, Primarius Richter. It was with difficulty that the Governor of Lausitz compelled this worthy's successor to give Böhme Christian burial. But in the more liberal air of Dresden he was much sought after by men of learning and influence, and a commission appointed by the Prince Elector to examine his opinions passed no condemnation upon them. "We cannot condemn," they said modestly, "what we do not yet understand."

Böhme belongs to the purest type of mystics. Shoemakers are generally thinkers, whether they follow Plato or Bradlaugh; but Northampton has yet to produce a parallel to the inspired visionary, who gazed on a green field "before Neys Gate at Görlitz," till he saw the "essences, use, and properties" of the herbs and grass, and through them the mysteries of the whole creation; and who, on another occasion, fell into a similar illuminating trance after gazing intently at a streak of light visible through a chink in his door. He regarded himself as merely the organ through which the Divine Spirit found utterance. "I am a foolish and simple-minded man," he writes. "Finding within myself a powerful contradiction—namely, the desires that belong to the flesh and blood, I resolved to regard myself as one dead in my inherited form, until the Spirit of God would take form in me. Now, while I was wrestling and battling, a wonderful light arose in my soul. It was a light entirely foreign to my unruly nature, but in it I recognised the true nature of God and man, and the relation existing between them, a thing I had never understood before." In such a mind every thought is pictorial, and a logical process is transformed into a series of flashes. The philosophy, when we disentangle it from the sympathetic magic which he learned from Paracelsus, resembles that of other speculative mystics, such as Plotinus; but he contributes a new element in the great stress which he lays on antithesis as a law of being. "In Yes and No all things consist." Even in the Godhead, the contraries, good and evil, are already contained, but not as good and evil; they are there an equilibrium of naturally opposed, but complementary and harmoniously working, powers. Good and evil only become actual when the soul in its freedom chooses one or the other. The Godhead, however, itself desires manifestation. In feeling this desire, it becomes "darkness"; the light which illumines this darkness is the Son. The resultant is the Holy Spirit, in whom arise the archetypes of creation. In the same way he explains body, soul, and spirit as thesis, antithesis, and synthesis; and there are other triads of a more fanciful character. The central doctrine of his religion is the indwelling presence of Christ. Like other Protestant mystics, he revolts against the doctrine of imputed righteousness. "If the sacrifice is to avail for me, it must be wrought in me. The Father must beget his Son in my desire of faith, that my faith's hunger may apprehend him in his word of promise." Our rebirth and salvation through the indwelling Christ are only a return to our primordial divine condition. "Nothing can rest in itself; it must return whence it came." The mind has turned away from unity in a desire for experience; it "has tried things in separation, and therefore separation arose in it." It cannot be set free till it forsakes itself and lifts itself again into the perfect stillness, silencing its own will, so that the will may merge again, beyond sense and form, into the eternal will of the abyss whence it originated.

Many of us have felt the "attraction of the abyss," the longing to get rid of the self of experience, which separates us from God and the soul of the world. Böhme in this last passage speaks exactly like Plotinus, of whom he had probably never heard. The brotherhood of the mystics all use the same language. Time and place and creed make no difference to them. "He to whom time is as eternity, and eternity as time," says Böhme, "is freed from all trouble."

Böhme, in spite of his visions, was fundamentally sane. He was happily married, lived on terms of simple friendliness with many men of many conditions, encountered persecution with sweetness and unruffled composure, and died like a saint and a brave man. "The Three Principles of the Divine Essence" is not easy reading; but there are probably some who will find it strangely fascinating, and at any rate few will grudge the Teutonic philosopher the very moderate encomium of his English disciple, the worthy and supremely ridiculous poetaster Byrom:—

Of deep obscurity in Jacob Behme
Is but itself obscure; for he might see Farther, 'tis possible, than you or me."

In laying down this interesting record of a pioneer of modern radicalism and rationalism, the first reflection that arises is how it has come to pass that so eminent a servant of the people has left so trivial a mark in history. It is easy to escape by asserting that William Johnson Fox was essentially an orator and a journalist, both ephemeral callings, and that even in these callings he did not achieve the first grade of distinction. But the ample evidence which Dr. Garnett adduces to show the remarkable impression which the speeches and writings of Fox made, not upon the excited crowds who, in his later days as Corn Law Abolitionist, hung upon his lips, but on the most distinguished intellectual men and women of his time, requires some further explanation. It is true that the half century which has elapsed since his death has obliterated many of the records which a biographer most prizes, and has made it difficult to interpret with certainty some of the incidents in an eventful life. But when such allowance has been made, it remains unexplained why the man to whom Harriet Martineau, J. S. Mill, Macready, the Brownings, Cobden, Forster, looked for light and leading, should have left no monument but a bare mention in the list of nineteenth century radicals. Probably, as Mr. Edward Garnett (who brings to completion this work of his father) observes, the dissipation of his energy in so many channels of activity damaged his fame and diminished his net influence on his age. Moreover, it cannot be denied that certain properties of sententiousness and of florid utterance, common to all save a few of the great publicists of his time, repel modern readers. It was a time of large generalisations in politics and morals, and Mr. Fox dealt largely in them both on the platform and in the Press. Almost unconsciously we come to look upon such utterances as impractical and hardly genuine. But we do wrong to discount so heavily what was for the most part a manner. A fair examination of such a career as that of Fox shows a vast amount of solid spade work in reform. Beginning life as a Norwich weaver lad, he underwent a hard struggle for knowledge and for a livelihood before he passed through Homerton College into the Congregational Ministry, and thence to the Unitarian Chapel of South Place, Finsbury, which for so many years was his principal platform. From the first he combined literature with preaching, and it was his close association as writer and editor with the leading Unitarian periodical, "The Repository," that brought him into such close relations with the Martineaus, Tailors, and Mills, and the "gifted" ladies, Eliza and Sarah Flower, the former of whom was his life-long friend and companion.

Liberal theology, ever broadening towards a more scientific rationalism, occupied, however, a comparatively small part of Fox's mental energy. His literary interest was keen, and he was among the first to recognise the genius of young Browning and Tennyson, while his intimate friendship with Macready gave him a prominent part in the revival of great English drama in the 'thirties and the 'forties. Though always an ardent politician and a fearless democrat, it was not until 1847 that he was free to devote his full energy to politics. His work for the Anti-Corn Law League had already made him widely in demand as a popular speaker, and when he was returned to Parliament for Oldham in 1847, he was already one of the three or four trusted leaders of English Radicalism. Though favorable to the cause of Chamberlain, he feared the violent methods to which this movement appeared to be drifting, and thus came to attach himself more closely to the concrete and definite causes of Corn Law Repeal, Poor Law Reform, and popular Education, as the most serviceable lines of advance. Though not a great original thinker, he was a mighty propagator of the original ideas of others. Woman's Franchise, Home Rule, a National Theatre, Secular Education, abolition of the Death Penalty, Amendment of Divorce—such were a few of the "advanced" movements in which Fox ranks as a vigorous pioneer. Montgredien, in his "History of the Free Trade Movement," gives the following vivid portrait of him as orator:—

"Then came forward a round-faced, obese man, of small stature, whom (if you avoided looking in his eyes) you might take to be a person of slow comprehension and slow of utterance—a sleek, satisfied, perhaps sensual, person—a calm, patient and somewhat lethargic man. The only thing remarkable about him (always excepting his eyes) was a mass of long, thick, black hair, which waved over his neck and shoulders. This man spoke, and the vast audience was thrilled by his wonderful eloquence. It was W. J. Fox, the Unitarian Minister, afterwards member for Oldham. The moment he began to speak he seemed another man. His large brown eyes flashed fire, and his impressive gesture added dignity to his stature. His voice displayed a combination of power and sweetness not surpassed even by the mellow base tones of Daniel O'Connell in his prime. His command of language seemed unlimited, for he was never at a loss, not only for a word, but for the right word. Not argumentative and persuasive like Cobden, or natural and forcible as Mr. Bright, his forte lay rather in appealing to the emotions of his audience; and in this branch of the rhetorician's art his power was irresistible."

HILDEBRAND.*

It would be easy to draw a parallel between Puritanism in the Reformed Churches and Ultramontaniam in the Roman Church. Both have been movements of reform; both have been narrowing and possessed the vehemence that commonly goes with narrowness; to both the interior contradiction which they embody and the facts of human nature with which they come into conflict have been fatal: they are of the number of the "little systems" which "have their day." But in their day they were powerful, both for good and for evil; and their representatives must be judged historically by the requirements and standards of their time.

Religion has to preserve both intension and extension. If it loses the one, it becomes irreligious; if the other, sectarian. And it is no easy matter to balance the two. The comprehensive Church is apt to lower her standards to the popular level; the zealous Church to narrow down her membership till it consists of a real or supposed spiritual élite. That religion in the eleventh century required reform is beyond question; and Gregory VII. was a reforming Pope. This is his title to honor; and the prefix of Saint attached to his name shows that the principles of which he was the representative prevailed. It is no less certain that their triumph was temporary, and contained in itself the seeds of dissolution; the mortar was untempered, and the building fell.

From the time of the dissolution of the Carolingian Empire the Papacy declined. The Roman Church had to be delivered from the Romans, is Sohm's vivid phrase: at the end of the tenth and beginning of the eleventh century it was laid low by the violence of the feudal barons, and the scum of a rude society disgraced the Papal throne. In 1046 the German Emperor intervened. For the moment no other means of rescue were available; and no serious opposition was encountered by Henry III. when he exercised the right of nomination to the Holy See. But this solution of the difficulty could not be permanent. An Emperor beyond the Alps was no efficient protector; and the theocratic claims of the Papacy, dormant, not dead, were kept in reserve only till the moment when they could be advanced with reasonable prospect of success. Their most representative champion and assertor was Gregory VII.

Bishop Mathew's character sketch of him is graphic:—

"Gregory was permeated with the atmosphere of the Old Testament, and though a fervent admirer of St. Peter, there is no doubt his deepest sympathies lay with the Hebrew prophets and warriors. He was likened to Elijah; his energetic campaign against the immoral and simoniac clergy to Elijah's slaughter of the priests of Baal; and when Gregory, in 1078 and 1080, threatens the disobedient with retribution in this life, we are reminded of the stern Elijah calling down fire from heaven to confound the emissaries of the king who would do him wrong. With Samuel also he had great sympathy, and it is possible that he thought of himself as resisting Henry IV. as the prophet withstood Saul. Indeed, in the December letter to the young king, Henry is warned to avoid the fate of Saul. It is more than probable that Gregory's view of kingship, as conferred in his two letters to Hermann, Bishop of Metz, is based on the utterance of Samuel (I. Sam., xii. 17-19), who, to the people who asked for a king, replied: 'Your wickedness is great which ye have done in the sight of the Lord in asking you a king.'"

His temperament was not that of a saint; Sanctus Satanas is St. Peter Damian's phrase for him; he was a child of his age, and that a callous one; when a certain abbot punished his monks by tearing out their eyes and tongues, "the Cardinal Hildebrand took him under his protection, and declared that he had acted, 'not cruelly, but firmly and worthily, to evil men.'" His zeal for reform was sincere, though mingled with political motives: "the theory of Augustine's City of God, in which a new Rome was to use and rule the world by religion, floated before his mind." But while Augustine's theory placed its monarchical power in Christ,

"To the Pope there could be no Rome without a Cæsar, and the Cæsar of the spiritual monarchy was himself: in him were concentrated all power and all jurisdiction; he was their sole source . . . In his position as the 'Earthly Peter,' the Vicar of Christ upon earth, Gregory felt his power to be unlimited in spiritual things. 'How much the more then in things temporal,' he argued. St. Peter and St. Paul (and therefore Gregory, as the Earthly Peter), as they possess the power of binding and loosing in heaven, have also the power of taking away and granting the kingdoms of this world, principalities, duchies, marquisates, earldoms, and the possessions of all men. The Pope thus becomes an absolute sovereign over all things spiritual and temporal, the dominus dominantium. His power is a potestas ordinaria et directa. By this assumption Gregory brings his hierocratic system to completion: it becomes incapable of any further extension. The libido dominationis is satisfied!"

Bishop Mathew, it seems to us, makes too much of the modification of this position embodied in Bellarmine's theory of the indirect temporal power of the Papacy. The retreat from the older doctrine is apparent only, for the Pope remains the judge. The Vatican Council crowned the edifice. No Pontiff bore this in mind more persistently than the astute Leo XIII; none has acted on it more strenuously than Pius X. "The principle of authority can go no further once this extreme height has been attained: a retrograde movement must necessarily follow, and the force which will bring about this movement is just this undue extension of the principle of authority. We have seen the waters of Ultramontaniam rise in the course of the last century. They have not been from eternity; they are but of yesterday. As they came, so will they go."

AFTER LIVINGSTONE.*

MR. SWANN is a successor of the great explorers. When he first reached the shore of Tanganyika in 1882, nine years had passed since Livingstone died there; the site of the great lakes and the course of the greatest rivers were fairly well known, and Stanley was engaged on the enterprise of establishing the unhappy Congo State. For twenty-six years Mr. Swann remained in the newly-discovered regions about the southern lakes, never moving very far from Tanganyika and Nyasa, but carrying forward the work of exploration and settlement. At first he was employed by the London Missionary Society; afterwards, as an official in Nyasaland under Sir Harry Johnston, who writes a preface of commendation to this volume. So he forms a link in the country's history between the unknown days and the present time, when this part of Africa is almost as familiar as Europe, and he speaks with the authority of many years.

The real theme of the book is the extraordinary change that has come over the country within that brief quarter of a century. It is not altogether a change for the better. But for one thing, we should doubt if the appearance of Europeans had ever brought increased happiness to native Africans. Almost everywhere it has brought oppression, devastating wars, forced labor, drink, and hideous diseases. As a rule the native existence was fairly contented and happy before the white man came:—

"They lived a simple and easy life," writes Mr. Swann, "obtaining from nature everything necessary for natural requirements from the cradle to the grave; living in houses built by themselves, for which they paid no rent, cultivating in their own gardens just sufficient for everyday life; laying up no store, wasting nothing, with no 'rainy day' to dread, mutual responsibility insuring mutual help and support."

Such was the usual life of African natives, and such it still remains where European greed does not interfere with it. But in the lake region there was one thing that threatened the very existence of the people even before the European began his methods of exploitation, and that was the vast system of slave trade conducted by so-called "Arabs."

It is with the suppression of this slave trade—so largely connected with the trade in ivory—that Mr. Swann's book is nominally most concerned. And certainly he tells us a great deal about it. He shows how the slave raiders devastated villages and, indeed, obliterated whole tribes. He brings upon the scene the chief of slave traders, Tipputib, whose name was made so familiar by Stanley, and in one place he narrates a very interesting conversation he had with Tipputib himself in regard to Stanley's methods and treatment of him. He tells, perhaps, even more about the other great slave trader, Rimaliza, who extended a kind of protection to the white, as, in fact, Tipputib did also. And he describes many fierce encounters with the raiders and their forces. But on the eastern side of Africa, slave trading is now very nearly a thing of the past. The remorseless traffic is conducted on the old lines hardly anywhere in Africa, except in the Portuguese colony of Angola, and certainly it is by the courageous efforts of such men as Mr. Swann and Sir Harry Johnston that the horrors of the "Arab" system have been suppressed.

In spite of the importance of this subject, we should say the present interest of the volume lies in its account of the native life as it existed when first the author arrived, and the subsequent transformations which he has witnessed. There are stories of two horrible native executions—one by red ants, the other by crocodiles—but as a rule the impression we receive of the native untouched by slavery or civilisation is very favorable, and the African's sense of home and family is especially insisted on. The following account, for instance, is quoted from a Nyasaland mission paper:—

"When the child goes off on a journey, the mother awaits his return anxiously; sometimes, it may be, making a vow not to shave her head until he returns; on his return, she goes through a wild dance of joy, often casting white ash, or flour, over herself; and making a shrill noise: 'Lululuta.' She clasps her child round the body, sometimes round the neck, herself kneeling; she sees nothing of onlookers, of white man, or steamer."

All of which expressions of delight the present reviewer has often witnessed, as well as a mother's satisfaction in smelling the skin of a returning child; nor has he ever noticed the smallest shyness or restraint in a son's affection for his mother, even though he is grown up. Is it not the more shameful that, in the west-central regions of the continent, people with this strong family feeling should still be continually harassed by slave traders who carry off boys, men, and women alike to the coast or to islands from which they never return home? And yet the traffic is conducted under the flag of one European Power, and the other European Powers say nothing.

Mr. Swann writes in a simple and conversational way, but the general effect of the book is rather confused. Some passages are almost overloaded with detail, but it is often difficult to discover the dates or actual localities of the events. The author was at sea for many years before he went to Africa, but though his seamanship evidently made him a very handy man, it has not taught him to compose a very coherent story from his log, though he seems to have kept one.

YORKSHIRE.*

IN a small country like ours, Yorkshire is a big place. It has, by geographical reckoning, more than twice the area of Lincolnshire, which ranks next to it, and comes within a little of the area of Wales. Swaggering all over the northern portion of the map, it claims pretty nearly one-eighth of the total surface of England. Is not its county town, York, a county in itself?

Plainly it would be no simple task to cram up into one volume, demy 8vo, the Memorials of these aggressive "3,882,851 acres, or nearly 6,067 square miles." This the editor foresaw, and prudently he shaped his plans to suit his book. Instead of filling out the pages "with scraps of all sorts of topics," he decided to treat as thoroughly as possible a few of the most important ones. Readers, therefore, who are familiar with the series ("Memorials of the Counties of England"), if they find rather less variety in this volume than in some of its fellows, will also find that the selected subjects have been well and comprehensively reported on.

The matter of the Memorials has been distributed among nine expert pens. Prehistoric Yorkshire and Roman Yorkshire are respectively discussed by Mr. George Clinch and Mr. Norton Dickens. The Rev. J. C. Cox takes the Forests in charge. York and its Minster are the Rev. Dr. Solloway's care. To Mr. Hamilton Thompson fall the Castles and the Village Churches. Mr. J. Eyre Poppleton looks to the Bells. Norman Doorways are in the keeping of Mr. Charles E. Keyser. Canon North is responsible for Beverley and its Minster, and Folk-lore engages Miss M. W. E. Fowler.

Let us take a turn in the Forests, which once occupied a very considerable tract of this country. But, by the way, what is a forest? "You cannot," observes a wag unknown, "see the forest for the trees"; but we had, and still have, forests in England destitute of any stick of timber. In ancient English law—and the definition may hold to-day—a forest meant a territory of woody grounds privileged to creatures of the chase, both beast and fowl, and chiefly set apart for the sovereign's royal pleasure. St. James's Park in London, what was it at one era but a game preserve of that bloated character, Henry VIII.? An immense region of Yorkshire (and not, of course, of Yorkshire only) was formerly a warren of this sort, haunted by red and fallow deer, and wild boar, and birds that have long forsaken us.

"The popular idea," says Mr. Cox, "as to the cruel severity of the Forest Laws seldom takes into account that this early severity was greatly modified by the Forest Charter of 1217."

Game laws were bad enough in this country during many centuries, but they were worse in France. Right up to the Revolution they pressed sore upon the people (Louis XVI.'s diary is in the main a record of his "bags"), and under Louis XIV., in the great enclosure of the Louvre, which spread for six miles around Paris, neither grass nor any green food might be cut while his Majesty's partridges were hatching. To be caught a second time poaching a rabbit for the pot was to be whipped and banished for five years. England, at an earlier day, had respite from the more savage of the game laws; but some of us went to Botany Bay for troubles connected with fur or feather.

It was safer to be a dweller in fenced cities and buy your venison, or go without it. Touching fenced cities, it has been fabled of York that this fair northern capital was built, or a-building, while yet King David held sway over the destinies of the chosen people. It is an affecting legend, if it washes not more than indifferent well. But, if not to Israel, we can at least get to Rome through York, and this is something. Gregory's interview with the British slaves in the market-place of Rome is a story allowed to pass muster, and Dr. Solloway says:—

"In the struggles between Deira and Bernicia some of the subjects of Ælla, the King of Deira, whose chief city was at York, were captured and sent as slaves to Rome. A number of the children were exposed for sale in the market-place, at the time when Gregory was a young, rising ecclesiastic."

It was at the time when he was also a young, rising punster, and we know how he seized the occasion. "Not Angles," &c. Farther, when told that the yellow-haired children hailed from Deira, "Then," exclaimed Gregory, "from wrath—De ira—they shall be snatched." Yet, again, on learning that Ælla was the name of their King, his ready Reverence responded: "And Alleluia shall be sung there." Had Father Healy of Bray been able to secure for one of his Sunday suppers Father Gregory of Rome, what a feast of puns had been toward!

Great among old English towns was York. Its advantages as a place of residence during the Middle Ages would run into a catalogue. Dr. Solloway summarises them as "ecclesiastical, historical, military, defensive." Kings occasionally dwelt there, Parliaments from time to time assembled there, and the pageants of York—leaning now on the monastic churches and now upon the city guilds—have not impossibly supplied with a wrinkle Mr. Louis N. Parker. The library of bygone York was the envy of Europe,

"and the leading scholar of the day, one of its own sons, Alcuin, was called away from the city by Charlemagne to become the great educational light of the Continent."

From criticism of the celebrated Minster a laic pen abstains. The learned in these eclectic modes of architecture contrast cathedral with cathedral, transept with transept, nave with nave, choir with choir, and so forth; discuss the poetry of design that appeals to them in Wells or Salisbury, the fine and felicitous mixture of styles that charms them in Winchester or Canterbury. But this is a circle within which no layman dares to tread. Ruskin, in one of his too frequent lapses into the criticism that is associated with the nursery on bathing nights, dismissed the composition of the west front of York as "confectioners' Gothic." Fergusson, lukewarm on the whole in his praise of this cathedral, extols its western façade—for justness of proportion and elegance of detail—as equal to anything in England.

From cathedral to cathedral chimes. Mr. Eyre Poppleton's chapter on Yorkshire Bells and Bell-founders is one of the best in a company that is good throughout. Bells, like kings and kingdoms, come under fortune's hap. Works of art to the archæologist, they are, to the anxious bell-ringer, instruments that have a felonious trick of going wrong and needing to be replaced; and the artistic ringer, in a discordant hour, has privily conveyed to the melting-pot a cacophonous or cracked piece of bell-metal historically priceless. There was a Dean who sold a bell to replenish

Mysterious is the fate that, at one epoch or another, arrests the life of great and splendid towns. What secret of decay was in York that brought her from the high estate she owed?

THE HEALTH OF THE SCHOOL CHILD.*

THERE are few movements of the present day more full of hope and promise than those concerned with the care, protection, and health of children. The individual worker in these movements, and the various authorities, educational and sanitary, engaged in the work, have received in recent years fresh impulse and guidance from the legislature in the numerous Acts which have had for their object the improvement of the conditions affecting child life. But legislation, however well intentioned, and however complete in conception and statement, and though giving an impulse in the desired direction, needs also its own impulse from the people who are called upon to put it into operation. That impulse, upon which depends in a large degree the wise administration of law, can only be obtained by awakening a consciousness of the problems to be faced, and by suggesting in broad terms the direction in which progress can be made. That, as it seems to us, is the raison d'être of the admirable little text-book which has been prepared by Dr. Ralph Crowley, lately the Medical Superintendent of the Bradford Education Committee. It may be taken to be one of the results of his work in the schools of Bradford, and is appropriately dedicated "to the teachers and children" of that city.

Dr. Crowley's book contains a large body of facts and figures on many questions directly or indirectly concerned with school hygiene. But, though a text-book, it is a missionary treatise, having a perfectly clear and specific message, which we may express in his own words: "The centre of social responsibility has shifted from the adult to the child," and "each child must be considered as an indivisible whole, whose physical, mental, and moral development can never be considered apart, the unfolding of whose life, therefore, must be in harmony with the teaching of physiology and the laws of brain development." In these words we have what the author would call his "view point." All through his book the reader will meet with the subject of school hygiene viewed as an essential, we had almost said the essential, part of "the groundwork of future social action." The problem of the child lies at the basis of the new reforms for which the State is apparently ready. School hygiene is not something separate from the welfare of the community, a thing for doctors or school teachers. It is the beginning of "future social action." It is, in fact, the foundation upon which the nation is building. At first sight this may appear to be an extravagant claim, but a little consideration will convince one that Dr. Crowley is right. For our markets, and factories, and workshops, for the Army and Navy, for the work of colonists and Empire builders, the first essential and fundamental thing is the child, and mainly the child in the State schools. If from those schools we are turning out every year, say, half a million boys and girls, physically, mentally, and morally equipped and capable, we are laying the best of all foundations for the future, and not only the best of all foundations, but absolutely the only foundation upon which an Empire can be wisely built. And in doing this we are incidentally solving many of the problems which embarrass us by the road.

The second part of the author's point of view is scarcely less important. He fastens upon the individual child. The chief objective of medical inspection, he says, is the benefit it should bring to the individual child, and—this for the local education authorities—"the perfectness and satisfactory character of the methods must be judged mainly from this standpoint." Or if he is discussing special groups of children, blind, deaf, feeble-minded, and so on, he drives home the same point, the need for studying how we may best, most economically and effectively, assist the afflicted child. Or, again, if he is discoursing on school equipment, physical exercises, or even the school building, it is only as these things affect the individual child, how they educate and develop him, not how they appear in themselves or of themselves, that claim his thought. Moreover, the whole child is to receive the consideration which it deserves, physically, mentally, morally.

The burden of this book is naturally devoted to the physique of the child in health and disease, and, following upon a consideration of medical inspection, Dr. Crowley deals with the whole wide question of the treatment of the child. This part of his subject he discusses under Special Schools, the medical treatment of children found to be defective on medical inspection, the provision of school meals (of which the author is a well-known advocate), school baths and bathing, physical training, and open-air schools. On each of these themes Dr. Crowley has much common-sense counsel and practical advice to offer. But, at the back of it all, and through it all, one feels the breath of his ideal, the strength and importance of his great principle.

We are glad to believe that this point of view is not a monopoly of Dr. Crowley's. We believe it is widely held, though it may not have found frequent expression in the past. Without doubt it is the true inspiration of much of the new work which is being carried out all over the country by education committees and their officers. Dr. Crowley's book has been written largely for these two bodies of workers, the members of the committees and the teachers in the schools. To them it may be earnestly commended, for it is through them that his vision of the future can be fulfilled.

REALITY AND CONVENTION.*

It is notoriously the bad books which are easy to review. It is simple enough to hold up folly to derision, to point out the fact that the heroine's eyes and hair change color with every other chapter, that the split infinitive occurs on every other page, that the sentiment is ridiculous, and the construction infantile. But to give adequate praise to thoroughly fine workmanship is a more complicated affair, and it is with the sense of bestowing tame commendation that the writer pronounces Mr. Maurice Drake's "Wrack" to be a very good novel indeed, one of the best novels that he has read for a considerable time. "Wrack" is not a book of purple passages; it does not lend itself to quotation. Nor is it strikingly original in its mise-en-scène, since its action passes for the most part on board tramp steamers and merchantmen, and its characters are chiefly concerned with the governance of the engine-room. The hero is a good fellow, the average man plus a gift for mechanics; the heroine (who is a disaster) is well done, but nothing extraordinary in the way of women; the brutal old shipowner again is excellent, but not wholly miraculous. Yet; when one has read to the end, to the last awful scene of Philip's home-coming in triumph—to find shame and ruin and the end of all things waiting for him on his own hearth—then one knows that one has read a real book. It is, the writer imagines, in the just combination of scenes and elements and characters that the charm of "Wrack" consists; but whatever the secret, no one can deny the presence of an extraordinary quality in the story. It is above all things vivid; it reminds one of those strange dreams which come now and then to most of us. Not of the dreams of wild confusion and terror and impossible event; but rather of those quieter visions of the night when people that we know meet and pass us and look at us as they go by—and yet every movement, every glance, every word, hint an awful, unimaginable, and secret doom. It is some such spirit as this that Mr. Maurice Drake has conjured into his pages; and again he is to be congratulated on a great success.

There is a certain sect of critics which loves to scoff at tales of mystery, including, it is to be supposed, the work of Edgar Allan Poe in their condemnation. With these proud men the writer has no sympathy; he is not ashamed to own that he read "Jekyll and Hyde" with absorbed and wide-eyed interest, and that some of Sherlock Holmes's earlier efforts strike him as wonderful and admirable contrivances. The fact is that this interest in a mystery, this absorption in an enigma, this desire to know what is behind the veil is radically and entirely human, as much a part of man as the love of good meat and good drink. Enigmas ourselves, we are naturally enough interested in enigmas; incarnate mysteries, we find nothing that is mysterious alien from us. But the one fault in the mystery, or puzzle, or detective tale is this: that, when the secret has once been found out, three parts of the book's charm have vanished. Nobody can become re-absorbed in a riddle which he has just solved—unless, perhaps, the various pieces of the puzzle have been put together by the author with such exquisite skill that the mere tracing of the combinations is in itself a pleasure. And here one puts one's finger on the weak spot of Miss Florence Warden's highly ingenious and intriguing story. The interest—the mystery—begins with the front page and ends only with the last; indeed, the final paragraphs leave us with the sense that there is still something to be discovered: a thoroughly good touch. And the frontispiece, depicting a lady of the extremest fashion in the act of asking a young man whether he really believes her capable of coming up a coal-shoot, indicates the absorbing nature of the problems placed before the reader. But the mischief is that the young man—the hero—is a supreme ass. Nothing keeps this unfortunate fellow in the path of common prudence; he seeks danger as the bee seeks honey; he rushes into the most disreputable and deadly society after repeated warnings and repeated experiences, he has less sense of responsibility and a weaker power of initiative than a pawn on a chess-board. In a word, the puzzle—an admirable puzzle in its way—is not well put together: it is hard to be interested seriously in the fortunes of a person who runs his head not once or twice, but perpetually, against brick walls and iron spikes of mishap.

There are undeniably many fine things in "Cumner's Son," especially in the tale which gives a name to this collection of short stories. The brooding mischief in the bazaar of Mandakan is well indicated, the ride of the colonel's son through hideous perils to bring help to the beleaguered garrison is full of thrills, and thrilling also is the description of the English lad's meeting with the bandit chieftain, Pango Dooni. And yet the story fails of success. It has fine things, as has been said, and the fault perhaps is that these things are too fine, that the sunlight flames with the vehemence of the theatre limelight. It is allowable and indeed right to describe barbaric splendors splendidly; but it is necessary to preserve a certain contrast between the diction of Robber Chiefs and English colonels. Thus:—

"The danger—the danger!—and the lad so young," said McDermot; [captain of artillery] but yet his eyes rested lovingly on the boy.

The Colonel threw up his head in anger. "If I, his father, can let him go, why should you prate like women? The lad is my son, and he shall win his spurs—and more, and more, maybe," he added.

Now, what Captain McDermot would really have said would have been something like: "Rather dangerous mission, sir. Only a boy, sir," or words to that effect: while the colonel might have replied: "He's my son, sir, not yours, and the risk's our affair, and that's all about it." It is interesting to note how a few slight touches, a certain stiffening of the construction, and the use of such a word as "prate" avail to transmute drama into melodrama. And a tendency to this over-emphasised, over-expressed, over-fine way of writing is, no doubt, the chief fault in "Tumult." This is the story of a man who has made a foolish marriage, and finds his impossible and disreputable wife constantly on his tracks. It is not by any means a bad story, but all through it there runs this note of exaggeration. For example:—

"Stop it, for God's sake," he said, between his teeth. "I propose to make you an offer to settle things up. No more jeering, or you won't get a penny."

"Let us postpone talking business until after the meal."

The meeting with Barbara Keech and her brother hung pleasant pictures in the hall of thought, where, far back in its recesses, had lingered the calming atmosphere which emanated from her even as a girl.

"I ought to have known you better than to believe the professions contained in your letters and the farce you have just played for my benefit. Not content with getting me here under false pretences, you take advantage of the position to spring this atrocious surprise on me, going out of your way to arouse my bitterest memories with this and that!" pointing scornfully at her dress and complexion.

One does not know why, but somehow in these days people neither "jeer" nor "prate." Dr. Routh, who died in the 'fifties of the last century, aged a hundred, might have used these words naturally—he called his servant "sirrah"—but for the purposes of modern conversation their time is past.

It is refreshing after these excesses in diction to discover the pure vein of German sentiment as displayed by Miss Mary E. Waller in "A Year Out of Life." The heroine of the story transposes all things into the Teutonic mode: she speaks in terms of beer, and music, and wild enthusiasm.

"My enthusiasms were generally born of momentary impulse, and, with the gratification of the desire, were followed, as a rule, by indifference. And this new enthusiasm was first cousin to that with which I loved to watch the clear amber of the German beer poured foaming into the tall Steins, or the wild onrush of the incoming tides in the Bay of Fundy; but with the cessation of effervescence, the ebb of the great tides, my enthusiasm subsided, the interest waned."

And so, again:—

"These thirty days were filled with proffered pleasures; but to me they were empty of all true joy, as flat and stale as the dregs of the beer in the drained Steins on the students' tables at the symphony concerts."

Indeed, the whole book reminds one of an essay by Vernon Lee, describing the manner in which the German mind can synthesise Munich beer, the music of Wagner, and Leberwurst sausage into one great and harmonious whole.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"THE TEMPLE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE," edited by the Rev. W. Ewing, M.A., and the Rev. J. E. H. Thomson, D.D. (Dent, 10s. 6d. net), seems intended as a reference book for readers who do not care to go as thoroughly into a subject as is done in the larger Bible dictionaries. It begins with a general article on "The Study of the Bible," by the Bishop of Ripon. Dr. Boyd-Carpenter urges readers not to lose sight of the fact that all parts of the Bible do not belong to one class of writing. History, he says, may teach religion; but "religion can be taught in sermon, in poem, in parable, or even in fable, as well as in history. It is therefore important that the Bible reader should consider, as he reads, the literary form of the passage he studies; for in this way he will be surest of the meaning, and he will not lose the spiritual message in whatever form it comes." Mr. L. M. Watt gives a concise account of the history of the English Bible; and the articles on "Apocalyptic Literature," "The Targums," "Versions of the Scriptures," and "The Language of Palestine during the Time of our Lord," present the essential facts relating to these subjects in brief compass. The book is decidedly conservative in its attitude towards most controversial topics. Thus the arguments for the authenticity of the Book of Daniel are said to be "convincing," and the Maccabean date of that work "impossible." Dr. Iverach, who writes on the Fourth Gospel and the Epistles of John, accepts the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel and of the First Epistle, and dismisses "the interesting questions" regarding the authorship and contents of the Second Epistle as "more curious than important." In the article on the Second Epistle of Peter some of the arguments against the Petrine authorship are stated, but the conclusion reached is that "at the same time, and in spite of all this, there are still critics of repute who accept the epistle as genuine; and it is likely that the plain reader of Scripture . . . will still go on believing that he is in contact with a mind which was in contact with Christ in the days of His flesh." The plain reader of Scripture who buys a Bible dictionary need not be told this; he expects clear guidance and weighing of evidence from the scholars who contribute to it. He will consult many of the articles in the present volume without finding any decisive pronouncement, and the great fault of the book is its timidity. At the same time it will be useful to those for whom it seems intended. The book is well produced and remarkably cheap.

UNDER the title of "A Queen at Bay" (Hutchinson, 16s. net), Mr. Edmund B. d'Auvergne relates the story of the determined and successful effort made by Maria Cristina of Spain to secure the throne for her daughter, Isabella II. Cristina's husband, Ferdinand VII., one of the worst of the Spanish Bourbons, married as his fourth wife Maria Cristina of Naples. The issue of the marriage was a daughter, Isabella, who, by the Salic law, could not succeed to the throne, which should have come to Don Carlos, the King's brother. However, shortly before his death, Ferdinand proclaimed a "pragmatic sanction" abolishing the Salic law, which had been passed by the Cortes at a secret session in 1789, and had received the approval of Carlos IV. Some time before Ferdinand's death Cristina and Don Carlos had become sworn enemies, and when Cristina assumed the Regency of the kingdom she weakened her position, within three months of Ferdinand's death marrying Munoz, a young officer with little more than his appearance to recommend him. Civil war broke out soon afterwards, and for a time Carlos seemed likely to win the throne. The death of Zumalacarregui and the appearance on the scene of Espartero turned the scale, and, though she had to retreat for a time to France, Cristina, by dint of persistence and shrewd sense, won the throne for her daughter. The period is one of importance in Spanish history, since during it the constitutional monarchy was founded; but the web of intrigue is so thickly woven that it is difficult to disentangle the salient facts or judge of the leading personages with any confidence. Mr. d'Auvergne's book paints Cristina as "a human woman, always thinking more of her husband, her children, and immediate dependents than of the millions of unseen and unknown Spaniards whose custody a droll tradition had committed to her."

MR. CUTHBERT HADDEN, like a wise man, writes for the largest musical public attainable—the public that has neither time nor inclination to delve very deeply into musical history or criticism for itself, but is glad to have the cream of these skimmed for it by someone else. For this kind of people his "Master Musicians" (Foulis, 3s. 6d. net) is just the kind of book they require. Mr. Hadden talks very agreeably about the master musicians; and no one who is dying to know what clothes this or that master wore when composing, or any other thrilling personal detail, will be sent empty away from Mr. Hadden's book. There are one or two small errors that might be corrected in later editions of the volume—for later editions it is bound to have. Bach (p. 37) did not go to Hamburg in 1720 to hear Reinken, but to play to him and other musicians of the town. The statement (p. 44) that Bach took all his annoyances at Leipzig "calmly and philosophically" is quite wrong; Bach made half the annoyances for himself by his cantankerous temper, worked himself into a blind rage over some of them, and was undoubtedly very unhappy for a great part of his time. On page 99 Mr. Hadden holds to the old theory that Beethoven's "Immortal Beloved" was Giulietta Guicciardi, which can hardly be said to hold its ground since the publication of La Mara's ably reasoned contention that the beloved was Theresa von Brunswick. The photographs in the volume are well-meaning, but rather trying; almost every composer's face is sentimentalised in the most painful Teutonic way.

THE part that Oxford University has played in the history of the nation is well told by Mr. Ralph A. Durand in "Oxford: Its Buildings and Gardens" (Grant Richards, 21s. net), a beautifully got-up color book, for which Mr. W. A. Wildman has supplied thirty-two illustrations of the colleges. Of the more personal history of its ancient institutions and customs there is, too, an abundance, well and picturesquely set forth; for Mr. Durand, while relying for his material on past authorities, especially on Rashdall's "Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages," has clothed it with a new life and color, and given it the flavor of a sounding epic. Just as the average Londoner takes but little trouble to get at the meaning of London, so the average Oxford man is woefully ignorant of the origins of many institutions peculiar to his University. He accepts them when he hears of them for the first time, absorbs them as a part of his daily life, and does not trouble to investigate them; just as he accepts his copy of the "Decreta et Statuta" on matriculation, and does not think of reading it. To many such men, particularly those to whom Oxford is only a tender memory, Mr. Durand's book should open fresh sources of interest. It includes a vivid description of the Town and Gown Rows, and inter-college feuds that are now unknown, but were once a standing menace, not only to the learning, but to the lives of the students; it deals, with a light touch, with such still surviving matters as Proctors, and "The Gentle Art of Ragging"; and it conjures up pictures of social Oxford, as it was in the days of the medieval schoolmen, under Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, under the Stuarts and the Georges, and in the nineteenth century, that lack nothing in actuality. A chapter is devoted to the literary men whom Oxford has fostered. Swinburne is said to have remarked that the University had "turned out poets in more senses than one," when he himself went down without taking his degree, and it is a curious reflection that a very large proportion of Oxford poets departed degreeless in the same incontinent manner. Such was the case with Southey, Shelley, and the inimitable Calverley. Neither has the beauty of Oxford and her landscape inspired many verses, though Matthew Arnold, moved by the memory of his dead friend, Arthur Henry Clough—as Tennyson was moved by the death of Hallam—celebrated the scenes that both of them knew and loved in tender, musical lines. Mr. Durand has lightened his pages with several amusing yarns of past and present celebrities, and his description of Oxford's classic gardens is swayed by horticultural knowledge and poetic feeling. These gardens, too, owe something to Mr. Wildman, whose broad, spacious water-colors suggest alike their infinite peace and their close relationship to the venerable buildings overlooking them.

NOBODY is likely to quarrel with Professor E. A. Gardner's selection of "Six Greek Sculptors" (Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net), representing the golden age of Greek art. The list begins with Myron and ends with Lysippus, thus embracing the fifth and fourth centuries B.C.; and it includes Phidias, Polyclitus, Praxiteles, and Scopas. Neither is its usefulness confined to penetrative studies of these individual masters, since an introductory chapter sketches the origins of the art that reached maturity in these centuries, and a concluding essay deals with the later Hellenistic developments. The book, in short, very nearly covers the ground of the author's "Handbook of Greek Sculpture," and broadly summarises the facts and theories put forward in that exhaustive work. In dealing with such a subject, biographical detail is, of course, impossible, and criticism is in most cases purely inductive. There are so few genuine Greek monuments extant; we have to rely for our conclusions about the merits of the respective sculptors almost entirely upon the Græco-Roman copies of their works and upon the literary testimony that has been handed down to us. Thanks to recent discoveries, however, the modern student is in a very much better position for arriving at a just opinion than were his predecessors of the eighteenth century, who solemnly accepted the Græco-Roman copies as the authentic examples, and made none of the allowances that are nowadays considered necessary. It is an astonishing circumstance that any of the judgments arrived at by those aesthetic philosophers can be allowed to stand; yet, as Professor Gardner and others have pointed out, their contribution to the knowledge of the subject, albeit based on fallacious premises, supplies some curiously true conclusions. The literary evidence of Greek sculpture, contemporary and later, is dealt with faithfully in this volume, and the characteristics of the masters are differentiated in a way that leaves a perfectly clear impression of the art of each, while, at the same time, the fact of their mutual relationship is kept steadily to the front. The text is greatly helped by a quantity of excellent photographic reproductions of authentic Greek statuary and Græco-Roman versions placed, when possible, side by side. This is illustration in its most useful sense.

"GEORGE SAND: SOME ASPECTS OF HER LIFE AND WRITINGS" (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net), is a translation, by Miss Alys Hallard, of a course of lectures given by M. René Doumic, of the French Academy. The book, in its French form, was noticed in THE NATION for August 21st, 1909. The translation is, on the whole, well done, and the book, though described by its author as merely "a series of chapters touching on various aspects of George Sand's life and writings," presents a fairly complete picture of her personality. The English reader will find in the volume a good account of a writer who, once rated above her deserts, has now fallen into an undue neglect.

AFTER the tremendous activity of the last account, the Stock Markets have sobered down a little, and this slight reaction has been assisted by the general tightening of the money and discount markets. The Bank of Belgium raised its rate on Monday, and it is probable that for some time money will be moderately dear. Whether this will check the expansion of trade, as well as of speculation, remains to be seen. There has been a good deal of anxiety in the City, especially among those interested in American and Canadian bonds about the threatened tariff war between Canada and the United States. But Tuesday's advices were more satisfactory, and Mr. Taft's game of golf with Lord Grey certainly points to an agreement. The American bond market is very weak and seems to offer now, or in the near future, good opportunities for permanent investment on this side. The tenders for the New York City issue do not seem to have been very satisfactory. The City would get better terms if it could have arranged for a London issue. But that would have been a rather open confession of New York's financial dependence on London. Speculative interest still centres in the rubber market, and attention has been attracted to the great quantities of rubber recently imported into the United States. It is thought that these are speculative purchases and will be weakly held, in which case a sharp fall in the price of rubber might occur at any time. Business conditions in the United States are not satisfactory, and there has been quite a large crop of strikes, in many cases accompanied by such violence that the troops have been called out. The strike at the Coats thread mills in Pawtucket ended on Monday; the operators returned at the old wages, a rather significant comment upon Tariff Reform. Discontent at the high cost of living seems to be universal in Canada, the United States, and the Spanish Republics of South America. As to the Budget, the City is beginning to realise that the cry for its production raised on the Unionist side is not dictated by any wish to end the financial confusion, but only aims at embarrassing the Government.

OLIVIA L. CAREW

The typical conflict in the life of the modern woman—the conflict between personal ambition and the ordinary claims of married life—forms the pivot of this story. A strong personality, which refuses to face the essential facts of the union between man and wife, leads the heroine to tragedy. And if the solution found at last for her approximates to a more conventional ideal, it is a conventionality not taken for granted, but discovered as the ultimate lesson of experience. This is a book to make one think.
